The above claims represent awards which were placed, after competition, with the lowest bidders on the individual items, which is an evidence of the reasonable value of the material furnished and the services rendered at the time purchases were made. Furthermore, these transactions were handled strictly in accordance with the requirements of the law and the Navy Regulations excepting, as stated above, the requirement of section 3744 relative to entering into contracts having been overlooked by the contracting officer.

As the supplies called for by these orders were accepted and used by the Government, the department requests that legislation be enacted by Congress which will authorize the payment of these claims, and incloses draft of a bill for that purpose.

Very respectfully,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

During the consideration of the bill by your committee the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS,
Friday, May 26, 1922.

Be it resolved by the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives, That the attention of the Secretary of the Navy be called to the extravagant expenditure of the supply officer of the United States Navy mine depot, Yorktown, Va., who made various purchases of furniture for the use of said station; and it is the opinion of the committee that it should be the duty of the Secretary at least to reprimand the official who authorized such unusual expenditure; and be it further

Resolved, That we desire to call the attention of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives to the loose manner employed by the Navy Department in allowing such latitude to officers in making purchases for the naval service.

LUCY PARADIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2210) for the relief of Lucy Paradis.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that this bill be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to lay the bill on the table. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman reserve that motion?

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. I will reserve it.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I want to say to the gentleman [Mr. LEATHERWOOD] in this connection that this bill is one which passed the Senate some time ago. Lucy Paradis, away back in 1896, had 63 brood mares and a very valuable stallion killed by a veterinarian acting under orders from the Department of Agriculture at Washington, D. C. Now, in the first place, I do not think the Department of Agriculture had any authority to direct veterinarians upon an Indian reservation to kill I. D. horses alleged to be affected with glanders or other contagious diseases. The authority of law did not exist. In the second place, she is simply asking the privilege of presenting her case to the Court of Claims upon its merits and have that court decide the question of whether or not she is entitled to recovery. It seems to me very clear that she should be allowed to prosecute her claim. She can not do it without this legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, at the time I made the motion I understood that this matter had been disposed of in another bill, and therefore, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion to lay the bill upon the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction be, and hereby is, conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render final judgment upon the claim of Lucy Paradis for horses belonging to her and killed and destroyed upon the Cheyenne River Indian Reservation, or elsewhere, in the State of South Dakota, by the Indian agent in charge of said Cheyenne River Indian Reservation and other persons under his authority, with right of appeal as in other cases.

That a petition may be filed by the attorneys of the said Lucy Paradis in said court within six months from the approval of this act, and service of said petition shall be had by filing copies thereof with the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Interior, and answer thereto shall be filed in said court within 60 days after the service of the petition.

The court may receive and consider all papers, depositions, records, correspondence, and documents heretofore filed in the executive departments of the Government, together with any other evidence offered, and shall render a judgment or decree thereon for such amount, if any, without interest, if any, as the court shall find legally or equitably due the said Lucy Paradis.

Said cause shall be advanced on the calendar of said court, and the amount for which judgment may be rendered, when paid to the party named in said judgment or her duly authorized and accredited attorney, shall be received in full and final settlement of the claim for said unlawful destruction of said horses.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

RENTAL OF FIRST FLOOR OF CUSTOMHOUSE, MOBILE, ALA.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11731) to provide for the renting of the first floor of the customhouse at Mobile, Ala., to the Mobile Chamber of Commerce.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to rent, under such terms and conditions and for such period as he may prescribe, to the Chamber of Commerce, Mobile, Ala., the first floor of the customhouse, situated at the corner of Royal and St. Francis Streets, in the city of Mobile, Ala., or such parts of the first floor of the above-mentioned Federal building as may be used by the said chamber of commerce.

The committee amendment was read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, strike out the words "and directed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY TARGET RANGE, ETC., CHANDLER, OKLA.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6204) to grant the military target range of Lincoln County, Okla., to the city of Chandler, Okla., and reserving the right to use for military and aviation purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, under the reservation of objection, I am in doubt whether we should launch into the policy of granting public lands to municipalities or States for public parks, even with the reservation they may be subsequently used for public purposes. I do not recall an instance where we have done that in the past.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I simply wish to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin I share with him his opinion, but this is a rather peculiar case, and I would be glad if he would permit the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. PRINGEY] to make a statement in connection with this matter, which led the Committee on Military Affairs to give it favorable consideration.

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. PRINGEY. Mr. Speaker, I am much obliged to the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin. I just wish to say to the membership that 13 years ago our adjutant general came to our city and talked about establishing a rifle range. We were delighted at the thought of having the boys with us two or three times a year in the practice. Many of our boys belonged. We sold them the property. They required us to supply water. We expended $15,000 in the extension of our waterworks and building a macadam highway the full length of the rifle range, and about the time we had made this expenditure the practice was moved out to Fort Sill. Then coming up here, after I had prepared a bill, I secured the indorsement of the adjutant, our governor, and Mr. Weeks, and it was reported favorably by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRINGEY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The report states, as the gentleman has just said, that the municipality expended money in the building of a macadam road? Where was that macadam road built? Was it on the rifle range or leading to it?

Mr. PRINGEY. Right on the line, extending a street occupying a part, I presume, of the rifle range.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the improvement redound to the benefit of the property owners on the other side of the rifle range?

Mr. PRINGEY. Well, on the other side we have a small park; but it is not a highway out into the country, because it runs up into the bluff there where we made the bluff shots, as it is called, where they shoot into the bank. It is for the exclusive benefit of the rifle range.

Mr. STAFFORD. So your contention is that the municipality has really expended money for the former benefit of the Government for which they now wish to have reimbursement by the return of this property?

Mr. PRINGEY. That is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish this bill to be taken as a precedent, especially in the next five weeks of my service here. Particularly in cases where the Government owns public land, as in the case of an Army post, and no longer needs it for a National Government activity I believe we should not grant those lands gratuitously to municipalities for public purposes. I can see an exceptional condition in this instance, where the municipality has expended large sums of money, which will go for naught unless the return is made. I also realize that in this case if this land were sold the proceeds would go to the Militia Bureau for expenditure for National Guard purposes. Now, if the governor of the State and the adjutant general wish to take some money from the fund which could properly be applied to the National Guard purposes and have it go to the municipality I will not press the objection. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill. The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the title and fee to the military target range of Lincoln County, Okla., described in words and figures as follows, to wit: The south half of the south half of the northwest quarter of section 9, in township 14 north, of range 4 east, of the Indian meridian; except the land described as follows: Beginning at the southeast corner of said northwest quarter of section 9, running thence west 363 feet; thence north 445 feet; thence east 363 feet; thence south 445 feet to the place of beginning. Also, except the right of way of the Choctaw, Oklahoma & Western Railroad, now the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad, being a strip of land 100 feet in width across said land, extending 50 feet on each side of the center of the roadbed or main track of said railroad company. Also, except a strip of land 16 feet wide across the south line of the northwest quarter of said section 9, extending from the west line of the right of way of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad to the west line of the said northwest quarter of the said section 9, said tract so conveyed containing 34.48 acres, according to the survey thereof. And the south half of the south half of the northeast quarter of section 8, in township 14, north of range 4, east of the Indian meridian, containing 40 acres, according to the Government survey thereof. And the south half of the northwest quarter of section 8, in township 14, north of range 4, east of the Indian meridian, be, and the same is hereby, granted and conveyed to the city of Chandler, Okla., to be used as a public park, subject, however, to the right of the United States to at any time reenter and occupy the same for military purposes or as an aviation field; or the same may be used for said purposes by the militia of the State of Oklahoma under such terms and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War of the United States of America.

With a committee amendment as follows:

On page 3, line 6, insert: "Provided, however, That in the event the said lands are not used for the purposes specified in this act, the same shall revert to the United States: And provided further, That said lands shall be subject to the right of the United States at any and all times and in any manner, to assume control of or use and occupy the same or any part thereof, without license, consent, or leave from said city or State for any and all military purposes, including use for a target range or aviation purposes, free from any conveyance, charges, incumbrances, or liens, made, created, permitted, or sanctioned thereon by said city or State."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman wish to amend the committee amendment?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. On page 3, line 7, after the word "used," insert the phrase "by the municipality."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD to the committee amendment: On page 3, line 7, after the word "used," insert the words "by the municipality."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the intention seems to be to have the use discontinued by the municipality.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ROBERT GUY ROBINSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11389) for the relief of Robert Guy Robinson.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the reservation of an objection, I think we should have some explanation of this bill before the objection stage has passed.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, this bill in effect relieves this man from the statute of limitations. The act of July 12, 1921, reads in part as follows:

That all officers of the Naval Reserve Force and temporary officers of the Navy who have heretofore incurred or hereafter may incur physical disability in the line of duty in time of war shall be eligible for retirement under the same conditions as now provided by law for officers of the Regular Navy who have incurred physical disability in line of duty: Provided, however, That application for such retirement shall be filed with the Secretary of the Navy not later than October 1, 1921.

Lieutenant Robinson did not make the application within the time allowed. He was in Michigan nursing his injuries and had no knowledge of this law. This law was approved on July 12, 1921, as I said, and the limitation became effective on October 1, 1921. As the hearings show, Lieutenant Robinson had no knowledge of the enactment of this law until he came to Washington on Armistice day, November 1, 1921. He is a young man who went through the whole service. He has a remarkable war record.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation.

Mr. BLACK. Is this officer now drawing any compensation under the war-risk insurance?

Mr. MICHENER. He is now drawing $39.60. He is a man who, I will say to my colleagues, was wounded 21 times. He now carries two bullets in his body. Mr. Robinson is a medal-of-honor man, having been wounded in action over Flanders front on October 13, 1918, being the flying mate of Lieut. Ralph Talbot, now deceased. He was recommended for commission by Maj. D. B. Roben, after an engagement on October 8, 1918, while attached to Pilots Pool Squadron 218, R. A. F., and was again recommended by Major Roben before his (the major's) death, but the commission never materialized.

Lieutenant Robinson enlisted in the Marine Corps May 22, 1917, at the Marine Barracks, Parris Island, S. C., and from there was transferred to Mobile Artillery Force, Ninety-second Company, Marine Barracks, Quantico, Va. From there he was sent to Curtiss Field, Miami, Fla., for flying duty and as aerial gunner. Later he was transferred to Wilbur Wright Field, Dayton, Ohio, for further instruction in gunnery and bombing. From thence transferred to Philadelphia Navy Yard; then to Hoboken, and sailed on the U. S. S. De Kalb for overseas service. He received the medal of honor for extraordinary heroism in the first marine aviation force at the front in France. Also received official commendation on October 12, 1918, in appreciation of his good work. Also received official commendation on December 15. Lieutenant Robinson received the following wounds while in service overseas: Left ankle; left knee; between ankle and knee; left hip; right shoulder; through abdomen, entering left side and coming out back; left forearm and elbow, removing elbow, leaving a flail joint. Eyes and lungs bad, especially left eye. Spits blood. While in the service, both the father and mother of this young man died, and in consequence he has no home and no place to go.

Lieutenant Robinson returned to the States in January, 1919, and a transfer was given him to go to the Washington Naval Hospital, where he remained until June 17, 1919, when he was commissioned and placed on the inactive list, class 5, United States Marine Corps.

Had Mr. Robinson known of the above law, under which he could have been retired, he would have applied for retirement and the Secretary of the Navy would have approved his application.

No official notice of the enactment of the law was given. He was sick and injured; he was in that condition, and all this law proposes is to say to him, "Lieutenant Robinson, you came home from the war all shot to pieces; you went back to your home in Michigan, where your mother and father had died during the war. You were in such a condition that you are not charged with the responsibility of knowing that in order to get the benefit which this Congress intended that you should have that you must have made application before October 1, 1921."

I know the sentiment of the Members of this body in matters of this kind and feel assured that a mere technicality will not prevent this deserving, patriotic lad from receiving that which is rightfully his.

Mr. BLACK. I had read the report of the very remarkable record of this officer, and the question I wanted to ask was, if the officer is retired under the provision of this bill and of the previous law, will the compensation that he draws from the Veterans' Bureau be discontinued and will he receive the retired pay of his rank?

Mr. MICHENER. I think my colleague is right in that particular. He can not draw the two compensations.

Mr. BUTLER. I will say to my friend from Texas that I am responsible for this limitation. I voted for the bill and assisted in having it passed, and then a little later I asked Congress to close the door, requiring all applications to be made within a certain time; but this case is very unusual. It is the first time in the history of our country that these officers of the reserve, as I call them, have been put on the retired list; but we considered the extraordinary services of this man.

Mr. BLACK. I do not object to this case at all.

Mr. BUTLER. He had no way of knowing of the limitation, and we thought it was only fair to let him in.

Mr. MICHENER. I will say to my colleague that this matter has been submitted to the Secretary of the Navy and meets with his approval. It has been submitted to the Director of the Budget, so that it does not interfere in any way with the plans of the Budget for the current year.

Mr. BLACK. I notice that the report states that.

Mr. GENSMAN. Did I correctly understand the gentleman to say that the Veterans' Bureau has awarded this man only $39.00 a month for all these wounds?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes.

Mr. GENSMAN. Why not more?

Mr. MICHENER. Because he was not wounded in a vital part.

Mr. GENSMAN. Is he disabled?

Mr. MICHENER. I have not gone into that part of it. I think that my colleague is very familiar with the rulings of the Veterans' Bureau in compensation cases.

Mr. GENSMAN. I am very familiar with the situation of these soldiers. The case of a man who received 21 wounds and who is getting $39.00 a month is about on a parity with many other cases which I have had in the Veterans' Bureau. I wanted to know whether other Congressmen were in the same fix that I am in. I have the case of a man wounded almost that badly who is getting $15 a month, when he ought to be rated as totally disabled.

Mr. MICHENER. If I remember rightly, Lieutenant Robinson's disability is rated at over 50 per cent.

Mr. BUTLER. I think so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is authorized to appoint Robert Guy Robinson, second lieutenant, Marine Corps Reserve, inactive, a second lieutenant in the Marine Corps and to retire him and place him upon the retired list of the Marine Corps with the retired pay and allowances of that grade.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: "That so much of section 6 of the naval appropriation act approved July 12, 1921, as provided that the application for retirement of officers of the Naval Reserve Force and temporary officers of the Navy who have heretofore incurred, or who may hereafter incur, physical disability in line of duty in time of war shall be filed with the Secretary of the Navy not later than October 1, 1921, be, and hereby is, waived in the case of Second Lieut. (Provisional) Robert Guy Robinson, Marine Corps Reserve, inactive, and his case is hereby authorized to be considered and acted upon under the remaining provisions of said section if his application for retirement is filed not later than 60 days from the approval of this act."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to discuss this amendment?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may insert in the RECORD two typewritten pages.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized to discuss the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. I am going to ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD two typewritten pages.

Mr. SNELL. What are they?

Mr. RAKER. A statement from the soldier settlement board of Canada in relation to a question in which so many of us have been vitally interested, showing the workings of the soldier settlement act in Canada. I ask that it may be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. SNELL. I wish the gentleman would give us a little more information as to what it is.

Mr. RAKER. It is a statement from the chairman of the soldier settlement board of Canada as to the workings of the soldier settlement act in the Dominion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD,
OFFICE OF THE CHAIRMAN,
Ottawa, Canada, January 24, 1923.

JOHN E. RAKER, Esq., M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of January 13 to the Hon. Sir James Lougheed, former minister of the Interior, asking for the last report of the Soldier Settlement Board of Canada, has been forwarded to me with a request that the information be sent you.

No parliamentary annual report has been issued since last year, and that covered the period for the previous fiscal year, which ended March 31, 1921. I assume from your letter that you have before you a copy of that report, but in case my assumption is wrong I am inclosing herewith a copy.

In addition to this, I am inclosing a typewritten statement summarizing the operations up to December 31, 1922. This will be printed shortly. I also inclose a compendium of facts as issued by the board.

If there is any further information that I can give you, I would be glad to supply it. The work of soldier settlement in Canada has produced some remarkable results. We have a mass of information on individual cases that is most interesting reading. Some of the successes achieved by ex-soldiers on the land are most inspiring.

The Canadian public generally are becoming more and more convinced that land settlement has been the most effective permanent reestablishment effort attempted in Canada.

If the American people ever contemplate a similar effort in land settlement reestablishment, I feel quite sure our mistakes and successes would be of great value to them, and in such case I would welcome any opportunity of assisting in any way I could.

Yours faithfully,

JOHN BARNETT, Chairman.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

ROBERT J. ASHE.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9316) for the relief of Robert J. Ashe.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Robert J. Ashe, who was a private in Troop G, Fifth Regiment United States Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 21st day of August, 1914: Provided, That no pay or other emoluments shall accrue by virtue of the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MAGEE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed and move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. STAFFORD. We are going to make a general motion of that kind with respect to all these bills at the end of the day.

LIEUT. COL. JAMES M. PALMER.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11603) to validate for certain purposes the revocation of discharge orders of Lieut. Col. James M. Palmer and the orders restoring such officer to his former rank and command.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Lieut. Col. James M. Palmer, of the National Guard of the State of Maine, who was in the Federal service during the World War, and who was discharged from such service during said war, and who subsequent to such discharge was notified by the War Department of the revocation of the orders discharging him from the Federal service and of his restoration to his former rank and command, and to whom orders were thereafter issued by the War Department and by the departments thereof, and by his superior officers of the Army, which orders were thereafter acted upon by said James M. Palmer, shall be deemed to have been lawfully reinstated in the Federal service by such orders of revocation of discharge and of restoration to rank and command, for the purposes of the succeeding clause, and shall be entitled, from date of notification of such revocation orders, to pay, travel, and other allowances to the date of his final discharge in the same manner and to the same extent as if he had not been previously discharged.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

HERBERT E. SHENTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7027) for the relief of Herbert E. Shenton.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Herbert E. Shenton, as reimbursement for expenses and inconveniences suffered by him as the direct result of personal injuries received by him on May 12, 1919, at Baltimore, Md., when he was struck by an automobile operated by the United States Army, the sum of $1,000 as full compensation for loss of earnings and incidental expenses resulting from said injury.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $462.39 to Herbert E. Shenton in full compensation against the Government for injuries sustained by an Army truck at Baltimore, Md., May 12, 1919."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM B. LANCASTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 472) for the relief of William B. Lancaster.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, this claimant in August, 1912, was in the employ of the Government working upon what was known as the Strawberry project in the State of Utah. At the date of his injury he was employed in a crusher. In close proximity to the crusher there was a gravel elevator. From the gravel elevator the waste accumulated to such an extent on the roof of the crusher, and the overburden was so great, that it crushed the building in which Mr. Lancaster was working and severely injured him. His hip was broken, he was severely injured about his shoulders. His face was crushed by the fall of the building until finally before he was released from the hospital nearly all of the bone of the lower jaw was removed. Since the date of the accident he has not been able to take food except in a liquid form. He is absolutely helpless. It is a case of total disability. There is nothing ahead of him except the almshouse or the charity of the community where he now resides.

I may say that he has subsisted on charity for the last few years. For a short time after he got out of the hospital he was favored with some small jobs by the Government, but his physical condition has gradually grown worse. His mental condition is also growing worse. The photographs in possession of the committee will show how severe and horrible was the injury to his face. His disfigurement is such that he shuns the companionship of men, lives in a mere hovel, subsisting on charity. He seldom goes out from the place where he is staying except at night.

I have personally examined his case. I called upon him last October, and I have verified every statement I have made in regard to his condition.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, if the facts narrated by the gentleman from Utah had been incorporated in the report, or one fraction of them had been incorporated in the report in this case, I would not have objected in the first place. He gives to the House, especially to me, some facts which are not in any way contained in the report on this case. As now stated by the gentleman from Utah upon his own personal acquaintance it brings the case within the facts of a private bill for the relief of a person in St. Louis, which was passed at the last session.

I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to William B. Lancaster, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, in full compensation for injuries received while employed by the Reclamation Service at the west portal, Strawberry Tunnel, Strawberry Valley project, Utah.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $40 per month, to date from the passage of this act, as compensation for injuries sustained while employed by the Reclamation Service at the west portal, Strawberry Tunnel, Strawberry Valley project, Utah, said monthly payments to be paid through the United States Employees' Compensation Commission."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, at this hour on Saturday afternoon I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. SNELL. Only Mr. Speaker I move that the various votes by which the bills have been passed this afternoon be reconsidered and that motion be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the various votes by which the bills have been passed be reconsidered and that motion lie on the table.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, is a motion of that sort en bloc in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say that there is not the slightest chance of any of them being reconsidered as they were passed by unanimous consent.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent, the Chair thinks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating the reply of the Sugar Equalization Board to the resolution passed by the House, which was sent up with the President's message two or three days ago and has not been printed.

Mr. SNELL. Has not that been printed?

Mr. JONES of Texas. No. The President's letter was printed, but it did not include the reply.

Mr. STAFFORD. How voluminous is it?

Mr. JONES of Texas. About a page.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The reply is as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

In response to the resolution of the House of Representatives of January 5, 1923, No. 475, requesting the President "to transmit to the House of Representatives the facts in his possession concerning the following, if not incompatible with the public interest:

"First. What activities the United States Sugar Equalization Board, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Delaware, is now engaged in.

"Second. What salaries, if any, are being paid by such board to its officials or employees, and what salaries have been paid during the last two years.

"Third. What other expenses are being incurred and have been incurred since December 31, 1920, by said board.

"Fourth. What money or property is now owned or controlled by such board.

"Fifth. Where such funds, if any, are now deposited and what, if any, interest has been drawn on same since December 31, 1920."

I transmit herewith a memorandum which has been sent to me by Mr. George A. Zabriskie, president of the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.), giving the data requested in the said resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by incorporating sundry resolutions passed by the Legislature of South Dakota affecting national legislation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record by printing sundry resolutions by the Legislature of South Dakota. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, we do not follow that practice, printing memorials of the various State legislatures. I object.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks that I made to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

SENATE.

SUNDAY, January 28, 1923.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, Thou hast been our refuge and strength and a very present help in time of trouble. Thou art always accessible to those who seek Thee earnestly in the fullness of Thy grace. Thou art full of comfort to all who in their distress and sorrow turn to Thee. Grant unto us this morning the brightness of Thy countenance, and as we call to mind some who have passed from these scenes of responsibility, we pray that such lessons shall be ours that as we fulfill various forms of duty we may be following along the track of those who served their generation by Thy will.

Comfort the sorrowing, filling the vacant places, so as to lighten their darkness; and on the whole range of the outlook of the mourning ones may there be given to them a vision of the life eternal.

Hear us, Father, in the struggle. Hear us in the loneliness. Be with us constantly. And may all who are called to high responsibility realize that their duties are to be recognized as under Thine own guidance and for the best interests of the land in which we dwell. Hear and help us. For Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate has convened for the purpose of conducting memorial exercises for PHILANDER C. KNOX, BOIES PENROSE, and WILLIAM E. CROW, former Senators from the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. The reading of the Journal is first in order.

On request of Mr. CURTIS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Tuesday, January 23, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATORS KNOX, PENROSE, AND CROW.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I beg to offer the following resolutions and ask for their adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolutions.

The reading clerk (John C. Crockett) read the following resolutions (S. Res. 422), which were considered by unanimous consent and unanimously agreed to:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. PHILANDER C. KNOX, late a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The reading clerk read the following resolutions (S. Res. 423), which were considered by unanimous consent and unanimously agreed to:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. BOIES PENROSE, late a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The reading clerk read the following resolutions (S. Res. 424), which were considered by unanimous consent and unanimously agreed to:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. WILLIAM E. CROW, late a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, within the brief span of nine months Death three times called his roll in the Senate of the United States, and three Senators from Pennsylvania answered to their names.

They had never faltered in the emergencies of life. Therefore it was without hesitation that they walked into the cloud that was waiting to envelop them. They were gentlemen unafraid.

It was fitting that Pennsylvania should be represented in this body by such men. They took among their colleagues the place that Pennsylvania has always held among the sisterhood of States.

For years and years the people of that great Commonwealth had enjoyed the comfortable consciousness that their interests in the Senate were safe in the keeping of two such men as Senator KNOX and Senator PENROSE, and the Republicans of the State had always felt sure that their party organization was ready for any storm as long as Senator CROW was on the bridge.

Looking backward, we now realize that there was no quality essential to political leadership which was not possessed in some measure by one or another of these three. All of them were Americans to the core. All were patriots in the best sense of the word. All were believers in party organization as essential to the functioning of the Government. All of them were men of courage and loyalty.

Intellectual power, combined with a clearness of statement and imagination tempered by common sense, were parts of the rich endowment of PHILANDER CHASE KNOX.

Love for people and a singular capacity to understand them and to influence their action were the distinguishing characteristics of WILLIAM EVANS CROW.

Practical wisdom, hatred of cant and hypocrisy, and a mind capacious enough to comprehend the whole life of Pennsylvania made BOIES PENROSE first among his equals.

I shall leave to my colleague [Mr. REED] the welcome duty of expressing for us both our admiration and regard for Senator KNOX. I can not, however, help referring to the profound satisfaction and pardonable pride with which Pennsylvania reflects that this son of hers was alike a lawyer of distinction, an Attorney General of eminence, a diplomat of sagacity, and a Senator of power.

Senator CROW was a Member of this body for so short a time that comment upon him must be confined to the long course of unconscious preparation for high office, which, had he been spared to us, would have made him a useful and acceptable colleague. As far as his term in the Senate is concerned, he was like a trusty lieutenant who steps forward to the place of command when his captain falls and is himself shot down before he has had an opportunity to show what is in him.

Senator CROW was born March 10, 1870, in Fayette County, Pa. The story of his life may be outlined in a single sentence. He was successively a farmer's boy with a wholesome love of the great out-of-doors; a school-teacher with capacity to inspire devotion on the part of his students; a journalist who knew how to find his way into the minds and hearts of his community; a lawyer whose resourcefulness and energy made him useful to his client and formidable to his adversary; and a political leader who made enthusiasts of his friends and friends of his enemies.

At the age of 25 he was already in politics and seer of his county committee. This was the starting point from which he moved onward and upward, becoming in succession chairman of the same committee and chairman of the State committee.

At 27 he married Adaline Curry, admired by all as one of the most charming girls of a countryside always noted for the beauty of its women. It was a singularly happy marriage and was blessed with three sons of vigor and promise.

He soon became the acknowledged leader of the party in his county. It was a beneficent but imperious leadership. While it lasted nobody got very far with his political ambitions unless he began by talking it over with CROW.

He was an influential member of the State senate. Successive reelections kept him there till Governor Sproul's appointment carried him into the Senate of the United States.

Senator CROW is said to have farmed more land than any other farmer in Fayette County. At his Chalk Hill Farm he assembled one of the finest herds of cattle in the United States. He was the soul of hospitality. All who ever entered his house were eager to enter it again.

Some men have abundant honor away from home and little in their own communities. Not so Senator CROW. I feel quite sure that the members of the delegation which attended his funeral at Uniontown will never forget the unmistakable evidences which they saw on every hand of the feeling of the entire neighborhood for their departed leader. As we listened with reverent attention to the simple and powerful funeral sermon we all realized that Senator CROW had won the richest and rarest of all rewards—the whole-hearted and affectionate regard of those who were best qualified to estimate his worth.

When I turn from Senator CROW to Senator PENROSE I find myself in the presence of a man of widely different type. CROW's hand was out to grasp yours. PENROSE's mind was waiting for you, but physically he held himself aloof. There was an indefinable reserve about him which he maintained when mixing with the humblest and most exalted.

He was a man among men. When in his prime his great stature and strong face made him a marked man in any group. As you watched him moving about among crowds of followers you realized that they were in the mood which moved primitive men to choose their biggest and strongest to be king.

He came of a good stock and from the outset opportunities of all sorts beckoned him. He was born just as the Civil War was about to break out. He died when the echoes of the World War were rumbling still. Intense activity characterized the years between his birth in 1860 and his death in 1921.

At Harvard he won marked academic distinction. He was recognized as a young man of great promise when he was reading law under WAYNE MACVEIGH and GEORGE TUCKER BISPHAM. Though he made a good beginning in the practice of the law, it was inevitable that he should choose politics as his chiefest interest. He could influence men and make them register his will. His mind was subtle and he liked the process of organization and the interplay of forces necessary to produce political results. He was elected to the Pennsylvania House of Representatives at 24 and two years later to the State senate. In the first of his three terms he was chosen president pro tem of the senate. He was a delegate to four national conventions. He was chairman of the Pennsylvania State committee and represented Pennsylvania on the national committee, the chairmanship of which he once declined. He was elected by the legislature to succeed Senator J. DONALD CAMERON and first took his seat as a United States Senator on March 4, 1897. He was reelected by the legislature in 1903 and 1909 and by the people in 1914 and 1920.

It would be out of place for me to speak in detail of his work in the Senate. Senators LODGE, WARREN, and NELSON were already Senators when he took his seat. All but three or four of the newest Senators served with him—a privilege which I never enjoyed. Mine was the grave responsibility of taking up the work which he laid down.

But during my year of service in this body I have found many evidences of his power. His forceful personality lives on in the memory of his colleagues.

During the days of tariff making I gained a vivid realization of his mastery of that intricate process. He studied Pennsylvania till he entered into the inmost spirit of her people and understood the practical operation of her vast industrial system. They celebrated Penrose Day in Pennsylvania to commemorate his service in framing the tariff of 1909.

During war time his patriotism eclipsed all partisanship. His wide and deep comprehension of problems of finance and taxation made his service invaluable as chairman of the Finance Committee.

I have come to understand as I never understood before how well deserved was the immense influence which he exercised here. It was the result of thoroughness, sanity, sincerity, and strength. There was a world of ideals to which he was a stranger, but at least he was free from the sentimentalism of many who would wallow in political emotion. What he saw he saw clearly. What he saw clearly he judged wisely. His judgments were not abstract conclusions but things to be carried into effect. And nobody knew better than he how to attain his objective.

As a party leader he has had few equals. Matthew Stanley Quay captured his imagination in youth and left upon him an imprint never effaced. He became in time the umpire in Pennsylvania of most political controversies within the party.

I doubt whether any other man could have discharged so well the duties of Senator while giving as minute attention as he gave to the politics of his own State. There is much that I could tell you of his constant contact with the politics of a city ward, while at the same time he was dealing effectively with great national questions. I have heard him criticized for this. But his critics must not overlook the fact that there is something to be said for the sanity and balance of the Senator who can take thought for the man who gets out the vote in the division while thinking also in terms of continents and hemispheres.

Of his personal characteristics I need hardly speak. To his colleagues they were well known. He was virile and fearless and unaffected. His information was accurate. He never talked unless he knew thoroughly the subject he was talking about. He never took two words to say what could be expressed by one. He had a keen sense of humor. I have heard many amusing anecdotes of his thrusts and parries in the course of debate in the Senate. He was not inaccessible to his humblest constituent, but he had a certain dignity which kept people from taking undue advantage of his accessibility. If he had any affectation it was the affectation of indifference to the finer feelings which actuate human conduct. He would laugh at sentiment, but he was capable of deep affection. He had few real intimate friends, but there were many for whose advantage he would gladly have made the sacrifices of friendship. He was slow to give his word, but when he gave it he kept it.

BOIES PENROSE possessed a unique combination of qualities. His was an intense individuality. When he answered death's roll call he left a place in the Senate which nobody can fill. The chair in which he sat is here. Others may successively occupy it. But we all agree that there will never be another PENROSE.

Three Senators from Pennsylvania dead within the nine months' span. Three sons for whom the State will long wear mourning. Three loyal Americans who deserved well of the Republic.

May they rest in peace and may light perpetual shine upon them.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, Senator KNOX died on the 12th of October, 1921, and Senator PENROSE on January 1, 1922; thus, within the short space of three months, Pennsylvania was deprived of her two eminent Senators and the country and the Senate lost the services of these two distinguished public men. I served with them both during their entire service in the Senate and I may venture to say that both were warm friends of mine for whom I had high personal regard.

I first knew Senator KNOX when he came to Washington to take the position of Attorney General in President McKinley's Cabinet on the 5th of April, 1901. He continued to serve as Attorney General in President Roosevelt's Cabinet until the 1st of July, 1904, when he was appointed to fill a vacancy caused by the death of Senator QUAY and was subsequently elected to fill Senator QUAY's unexpired term and then the full term of six years. He resigned from the Senate in order to accept the position of Secretary of State in President Taft's Cabinet on the 4th of March, 1909, and he was again elected to the Senate on the 6th of November, 1916. His public life, therefore, covered a period of a little more than twenty years, but during that time he held two great Cabinet offices and served ten years in the Senate. In all these high and responsible places his service was as distinguished as it was varied. One of the leading lawyers of the United States, he brought to the office of the Attorney General every qualification for that most important place, and it so happened that during his tenure he had some questions of unusual difficulty and gravity to deal with, conspicuous among them being the settlement of the title to the Panama Canal and the arrangements to be made with the French company. He was highly successful in all his service as Attorney General.

His other administrative position was the first place in the Cabinet of President Taft, and there he was called upon to deal with our foreign relations and with international questions, an experience which added to his remarkable ability and proficiency as a lawyer an especial mastery of international law and all allied questions. He took a very high position in the Senate from the beginning. He was one of the most trusted and respected members of the body, and great weight was justly given to his arguments upon any question to which he addressed himself. He was not a frequent speaker, but when he spoke he always commanded the attention not only of the Senate but of the country. He was much more than a lawyer of learning and of the finest training and largest experience, for he was a man who had thought carefully and deeply upon all public questions and especially upon those which concern our relations with the other nations of the earth. In the momentous debate upon the treaty of Versailles he took a leading part, and his discussion of the questions involved and the arguments he made, although not numerous, were powerful, lucid, and largely effective. They awakened an interest abroad almost equal to that which was felt by the American people. He always held decided opinions and was a man of the most entire courage physically as well as intellectually and morally. No one could ever have a doubt as to his position or as to his power of defense and attack which went with the assumption of any principle which was under debate. His sudden and untimely death brought with it a great loss to the country and to the Senate, as well as to his own State.

Mr. KNOX and his colleague, as I have said already, were both distinguished and could, I think, be described without exaggeration as remarkable men; but the career of Senator PENROSE was entirely different from that of Senator KNOX and his chief activities were in other fields. Although a lawyer by profession and a member of the bar, he went at a very early age into politics, and to politics, after he had once entered upon them, he gave his life work. Having held some important State offices, he entered the Senate on the 4th of March, 1897, and there he continued during the rest of his life, a continuous service of 25 years. He was a man of unusual and very real native ability. He stood at the head of his class at Harvard and had an amount of knowledge upon many subjects with which, as he never made any parade of it, he never was sufficiently credited.

When he devoted himself to the work in the Senate, which he did more and more in the later years of his service in that body, he showed very marked ability in dealing with all public questions and especially those committed to his care, for by his long service he rose to one of the highest positions in the Senate—the chairmanship of the Finance Committee. He had a mastery of financial questions, especially those connected with the work of that committee, and during the War with Germany, when party lines were effaced, he rendered most admirable service in all the difficult work which came to the Committee on Finance in connection with the revenue and bond legislation. But Senator PENROSE had an especial talent and capacity for political organization; and to the great Republican organization of Pennsylvania, of which he was for so long the head, he gave his time and strength to a degree which interfered with the continuity of his work in the Senate.

The leader of the Pennsylvania Republicans, he naturally entered at a comparatively early date the national field and very soon became a national figure—one of the most powerful men, backed as he was by his own great State, in all national conventions where the fate of the party was to be determined. He was a man of unusual force and, when aroused, of equal energy. Very early in his career we became friends, and our friendship continued unbroken during all the 25 years of service in the Senate. We were both graduates of the same university and, although his graduation was 10 years later than mine, this always constituted a bond between us. His power as a political leader and his capacity as a Senator are, of course, known to all who have any familiarity with the political history of the country during the past 25 years, but I have sometimes thought that very few people realized some of the other sides of Senator PENROSE's character, for he was naturally both silent and reticent, although always frank.

It may be said of all men, and they are not very many, who under our system of Government have risen to large political authority as leaders of the party organization in one of the greater States, that one of their conspicuous qualities always is and always must be party fidelity, as well as personal loyalty to friends and supporters. This was very characteristic of Senator PENROSE. A man who had supported him faithfully, no matter how humble his place might be in the politics of the State or the Nation, could always rely on Senator PENROSE's sympathy and kindly help whenever he called upon him. In one word, Senator PENROSE was a loyal friend, and I say that not only out of my own experience but because I knew a good deal of his relations to others. As I have noted, he was a man who had been distinguished in the studies of his youth and of his college days, and therefore had a wider knowledge of many things unconnected with politics than was usually suspected, and to those who were aware of the fact this quality made him a very agreeable companion, for he could talk of many things not included in politics or public questions.

I never could be sure how generally his wit and power of repartee were appreciated. He was by nature and by habit rather taciturn than talkative, but he had the keenest possible sense of humor and he gave utterance to it whenever the spirit moved him. His humor was apt to be sardonic, but it was always genuine, and the things he said were wont to be decorated by odd and unusual words not used by most people, but which were always fitting and expressive and gave both color and point to even the most casual remarks. Two years before his death illness came upon him, so severe and so filled with suffering that he was not expected to recover. But, thanks largely to his will power, he rallied and returned to the Senate and took up his work in the Finance Committee, which at that time was exceptionally heavy and laborious. Always sustaining much discomfort, frequently much pain, he went steadily on with an uncomplaining and very complete courage to the end, which came at last quickly and unexpectedly. He was a gallant figure as, crippled and broken, he faced his future and did his duty with a spirit unconquered by physical suffering. He was a brave man. His death was to me a very serious loss, which could not fail to be the case after a close personal association stretching over 25 years; but a man of such ability and power as he possessed could not be otherwise than a loss also to the Senate, where he served so long, and to the State, which trusted him and followed him for so many years.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, never before, I think, has it occurred that a State has lost within a brief period of less than 10 months three such distinguished and useful sons as those to whose memories we wish to pay honor and tributes of love and respect in this meeting to-day.

The great Keystone State has sent many illustrious men to represent her and the interests of the United States in the National Senate; and in the list, in bold relief, stand out the names of PHILANDER CHASE KNOX, BOIES PENROSE, and WILLIAM E. CROW.

I had the privilege and pleasure to be a Member of the Senate during the entire service of each of those three distinguished men.

I wish to speak briefly about my acquaintance with them.

PHILANDER CHASE KNOX: A man loved and respected by all who knew him; one whose name and career were familiar to old and young throughout the United States from coast to coast as well as abroad; who was repeatedly mentioned as one suitable for nomination and election to the Presidency of the United States.

My first intimate acquaintance with Mr. Knox began when he became Attorney General in President McKinley's Cabinet in 1901, which service was followed by five years in the Senate; then by his acceptance of the portfolio of Secretary of State in President Taft's Cabinet in 1909, and later by his election again to the Senate for the term which began March 4, 1917, and which was ended by his most untimely death on October 12, 1921.

His lovable qualities, recognized by all who came in contact with him either socially or officially, and his brilliant mind and devotion to his duties and the causes he espoused, endeared him to all of his colleagues in Congress, and I venture to say that there was never deeper or more universal regret on account of the death of any Member of Congress than was felt when Senator Knox was called.

BOIES PENROSE: A name that stands out in our contemporary political history as that of an exponent of power, stalwart principles, unswerving and courageous loyalty to his friends and to whatever course of action his conscience indicated as the one rightly to be followed. A man who consistently demonstrated that his life motto was, "Hew to the line, let the chips fall where they may." A man who was surrounded by devoted and admiring followers of his political faith, and against whom, in consequence, the shafts of envy were, no doubt, often directed.

We, his colleagues, who were his sincere friends, were cognizant of his power; but it instilled within us only admiration and the desire to benefit from his shrewd sense and keen judgment in matters before this body. His analytical mind and legal training equipped him exceptionally well for his duties here.

His death on January 1, 1922, at the comparatively early age of 61 years, took from our midst our staunch friend; a unique character; an able man; a useful Senator.

WILLIAM E. CROW, who came to the Senate to complete the unexpired term of Senator Knox, was our fellow-member only a little more than nine months, and unfortunately the mark of physical affliction had already been placed upon him before he joined us here. Therefore we who had not known him in private life were deprived of the privilege of close acquaintance and friendship. He came to us, however, bearing the reputation of a worthy son of Pennsylvania, and we regret that he was taken from us so soon.

Nature decrees that we shall be born, and that we shall die. So perhaps we should rejoice in the fact that our three brother Senators lived and gave such eminent services to their State and country, rather than mourn their death—life's natural sequence.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] had intended to be present to-day and to address the Senate, but he has found that it is quite impossible for him to attend because he is absolutely obliged by imperative engagements to remain absent.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the great legal learning, the great ability and sturdy character of Senator Knox have been so well portrayed, so eloquently presented by other Senators that I feel I could add nothing to what has been said to-day. My acquaintance with Senator Crow was limited to the few days he was associated with us in this chamber just prior to the time he left us, never to return. I shall, therefore, confine my brief remarks to him with whom I was in daily contact for many years.

Mr. President, the remarkable public career of Senator PENROSE has been and best can be stated by those Senators from his own State, who have been either associated with him or in close touch with all his political activities, and who best understand the genius of his prowess which has been so indelibly impressed upon the political destiny of the State of Pennsylvania ever since he entered the arena, a young and ardent partisan. Mine is the more humble, and yet to me more acceptable, task of paying my heartfelt tribute to his personal character.

For nearly a quarter of a century I knew Senator PENROSE intimately. During the greater part of this time I was associated with him on the Finance Committee of the Senate; and it was in the close and exacting labors imposed upon this committee, and in daily contact and discussion of complex problems, and in an atmosphere of partisan political contention, where words were often sharp and criticism often bitter, that I was able to comprehend in all its fullness the sturdy yet generous and always kind and thoughtful character of this great political leader. Calm and unruffled he met every assault upon his position, and with the grace and ease of a trained swordsman, he smilingly turned and countered each hostile stroke, never once bending in poise or swerving in affability. Whether within the close walls of his committee or in the forum of the Senate Chamber, he was always a strong and imposing figure.

"In council wise and calm in strife,
Like rock that breasts the ocean wave."

To the general public Senator PENROSE was a Napoleon of politics, whose skill and success in shaping political policies and in organizing his political forces for each successive campaign partook of the stern qualities of a military strategist. The American public saw only the cunning hand and unswerving purpose of the commander, pressing with untiring zeal toward the single goal of partisan victory. His friends and coworkers saw only the generous, sympathetic, and companionable general who never commanded a course but who always made his suggestions and gave his modest advice with such wisdom and clarity that they became the crystallized sentiment and convictions of all his comrades in battle.

Probably no great leader has been less understood by the rank and file of the American public. By nature modest and reserved, he never courted applause or raised his voice for gallery approval. The quiet way in which he was laid to rest, without ostentation or public rites, in obedience to his last request, but exemplifies his disdain for notoriety and vain glory. He asked for no encomium other than the good which would result from his labors.

But, Mr. President, no man in any State in this Union could reach or long hold the place occupied by Senator PENROSE by mere force of his political genius, however great. While all must acknowledge his mental acumen and his sound political judgment, his real power came from the heart rather than from the mind. It was through the hearty support of the vast number of his close, warm personal friends throughout his State and the country—friends who cheerfully took upon themselves any task imposed by their leader—that Senator PENROSE was able to dominate the political destiny of his own State and thereby become a great potential factor in the destiny of the whole country. And, Mr. President, that fidelity which was given to Senator PENROSE by all his associates, the depth of affection ever manifested toward him, the unswerving loyalty to his interest, were never born of a mere admiration of his intellectual greatness. Men loved him because of his generous, considerate, and lovable qualities as a man. Men were faithful to him because of his never-ceasing fidelity to them. No man could hold such a host of faithful followers as those who bore his banner aloft to victory on many a desperate political battle.

ground except he paid the debt of service in equally unswerving fidelity. The cause of a friend was always his own cause. And, for friendship sake, no effort was too great, no duty too onerous, for his undertaking.

Though uncompromising in debate, and sometimes caustic in his remarks, back of all was a heart as generous, kind, and sympathetic as ever beat in human breast. He fostered no grudge. He cultivated no spirit of resentment. He saw only the fairer side of his friends and the better impulses of his enemies, if I may use the term "enemies" as applicable to political opponents, for I can hardly imagine how anyone who really knew Senator PENROSE intimately could be an enemy. Those who had the honor of an intimate acquaintance with him ever found him to be the very soul of generosity and good fellowship. Those who had the right to call him by the sacred name of a friend found in that friendship a character as true and sure, as steadfast and reliable, as the mariner's guiding star.

Mr. President, few people knew or ever will know the intense suffering which Senator PENROSE endured during the last two years of his life. Shocked as we were to see upon his return to the Senate after a long period of sickness the giant form so shrunken and emaciated—shocked as we were to note the hollow cheek where pain had written with hand of torture the story of his physical suffering, still only those nearest to him ever learned the real story of those months of intense agony. Few also understood when he returned to his labors the power of will which held him to his task even while the shadow of death hovered over him. He never once lost touch with every question, with every important feature of the revenue bill which during his last days engrossed the attention of his committee. And often as he arose exhausted from his seat after a long session of that committee he found scores of men waiting to discuss with him questions of State and national politics. He heard all with patience and fortitude, and no word of complaint ever came from his lips. If at any time during the long and trying period of committee work, with nerves worn out and shattered from loss of sleep, he for a moment forgot his old composure, if a petulant or impatient word ever escaped his lips, his generous character was quick in self-reproof.

Mr. President, the great political domination of Senator PENROSE in this world of transient and rapidly changing conditions may soon be forgotten. But his personal influence, that fidelity, that generous indulgence which he impressed upon the minds and hearts of thousands of people, will not die with his death, but will be reflected down the ages, an ever-potential power for good.

No words of ours can thrill the heart once stilled by the icy hand of death. No voice of praise may lure a smile from the lips once chilled. The wreaths we lay, the flowers we plant and water with our tears, distill no fragrance for him who sleeps closely folded in the arms of mother earth. They are but the voice of love, which echoes back a sweet consolation to our own stricken souls. Though dead, our friend will live in our memory and give an added radiance to our own being so long as life shall last.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, it is a singular circumstance that we should be called upon to commemorate the public service of three Senators from a single State who have passed from among us so closely together as Senators KNOX, PENROSE, and CROW. The last named barely sat with us; and we can well believe, as his remaining colleague [Mr. PEPPER] said in announcing his death, that Senator CROW's inability to go forward with his work in this Chamber constituted no small share of the burden which accompanied his long and painful illness.

Senators PENROSE and KNOX, however, wrote large their names in the annals of the Senate, where one of them sat continuously for nearly 25 years and where the other, with divided service, had nearly half that period to his credit.

They were dissimilar, yet alike—dissimilar in physique and habit of mind, but alike in their strong mentality and purpose; dissimilar in tastes and general interests, yet alike in their power of concentration, their persistence, and their unswerving devotion to the principles which they espoused; dissimilar in the course of their pursuits, yet alike in the unflinching diligence with which they followed them. In them, indeed, Pennsylvania possessed an incomparable pair of legislators and representatives, in whose hands the great interests of the splendid Commonwealth never suffered. Each possessed and exercised wide authority, one in the field of practical politics and legislation and the other in the realms of law and reasoned argument. Each was a student, each was a scholar; each, though in differing terms, was a statesman.

Others who speak of Senator KNOX to-day speak of him as an associate. It is I alone, Mr. President, of all the body of Senators whose good fortune it was to serve with Mr. KNOX in this Chamber as inter pares, who can add to that the privilege of having served under him as a subordinate. Throughout substantially all of his term as Secretary of State I bore my country's commission as a public minister in a foreign capital. My instructions passed under his wise and sagacious hand and bore his signature. My reports went to him. And in addition there grew up between us that correspondence, frank and open, which generally develops between a Secretary of State and a chief of mission at an interesting and perplexing post.

Naturally, sir, I shall not advert in detail either to the official or to the unofficial intimacies which our relationship engendered. But it is entirely pertinent that I should here record my conviction that there has been no Secretary of State, from Jefferson down through the long line, who caused himself to be more fully informed day by day of the intricacies of our foreign relations, or who held himself in a more sympathetic and inviting attitude toward those whose services he dominated, or who received from his subordinates a more generous and loyal response of cooperation, or who dealt more frankly with his colleagues in the Cabinet or his collaborators in the Senate than did Mr. KNOX.

At the very inception of his term as Secretary of State there were necessitated a series of negotiations, world-wide in extent and necessarily delicate in their nature, growing out of the discriminatory provisions contained in the Payne-Aldrich tariff act. Secretary KNOX, in an incredibly short space of time and almost wholly by reason of the clarity of his instructions to our diplomatic officers on post, brought these negotiations to a speedy and successful conclusion. Thus, almost immediately he demonstrated himself as having taken to his new and high post those qualities of direct and truthful force which had previously marked him as a member of the bar, as an Attorney General, and as a Senator of the United States. Not to multiply instances, perhaps already well known, I venture to point out, in these days when the Senate is discussing the future of American shipping, that there has existed in near eastern waters a no inconsiderable tonnage of merchant marine flying the American flag and profitably employed, which may truthfully be said to have taken the seas under the aegis of an opinion rendered by Secretary KNOX, and which remained protected in its activities by his sterling Americanism voiced in his instructions sent to American ministers and ambassadors in that quarter of the world.

His second retirement from the Cabinet was followed by his second entrance to the Senate; and he has so lately gone from us that we can view his work here only in short perspective. But his associated colleagues, and the country, too, I believe, can never err on the side of too great gratitude in summing up his labors during the prolonged struggle which culminated in the rejection of the treaty of Versailles.

He was one of the few Senators whose attention was concentrated not upon the covenant of the League of Nations, about which beat the fluctuating gusts of the tempestuous debate, but upon the provisions of the body of the treaty itself, which he early held to be as the world now sees them—in capable of enforcement and laden with the germs of constant dissension if not of war. It was in the course of this debate that he formulated and proposed the peace resolutions which bear his name, which were adopted by Congress but to which the then President interposed his veto. These resolutions as originally drawn contained a paragraph to which I gave instant and cordial, though as it proved ineffective, support, but in which I thought and still think to have found a formula which if adopted would have prevented much, yes, all of the confusion and chaos which have marked European affairs during the past four years. That paragraph, Mr. President, contained, as I have said, the formula for peace, and it contained much more, in that it stated, unmistakably and by the authority of Congress, a doctrine which America should be proud to uphold, no matter whose name it might bear. Yet, delayed and mutilated though they were, it still remains an indubitable fact in American history that it was the KNOX resolutions which at length brought peace to the United States.

The satisfaction of this undertaking was still warm upon him when he left us. And he went from us, Mr. President, in the fullness of his powers, from his seat here to that realm where—

Beyond the loom of the last lone star through open darkness hurled,
Further than rebel comet dared or living star-swarm swirled
Sits he with those who praise our God for that they served His world.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I venture to say a few words concerning the late Senator Knox as a lawyer rather than as a statesman.

Of his career at the bar before he entered public life as Attorney General in the cabinet of President McKinley my knowledge is not sufficiently intimate to permit me to speak in detail. It was understood at the time, by those generally informed, that he had devoted himself assiduously to the practice of his profession with offices at the city of Pittsburgh for a quarter of a century immediately prior thereto, during which period that city and the region about it underwent an industrial development having no parallel in the history of the world; that in the gigantic controversies incident to that expansion and in the organization and direction of the corporate entities through which it was brought about, his talents were in constant and imperative demand and that they had proven quite equal to the severe test to which they had been thus subjected. It was popularly believed, accordingly, that he would bring to the discharge of his official duties not only a thorough knowledge of the law and skill in advocacy, but, as well, that breadth of view, that ease and confidence in the face of problems of great magnitude enjoyed by few unaccustomed to deal with such.

This estimate so generally accepted, his record in the high office to which he was called fully confirmed. It had not yet become a prevalent view that the Attorney General of the United States ought to be, or well might be, a man more distinguished for his administrative abilities than for any lawyer-like attainments; it was expected of him that he should in person present, at least to the Supreme Court, in all the graver cases to which the Government might be a party, the argument on behalf of the people or to lead in such presentation. The traditions which are associated in the public mind with the names of Wirt, Taney, Cushing, Black, Evarts, and Olney still held sway.

His accession to the office was particularly opportune. The public conscience was rising in revolt at the perfectly flagrant disregard of the Sherman Antitrust Act in the world of high finance. It had remained a more or less moribund statute since the decision of the Supreme Court in Knigh v. United States, believed by those who wished it so, to have pulled the teeth out of the law. Moreover, an unwholesome sentiment had been engendered, or at least prevailed, that the law might well be allowed to fall into innocuous desuetude; that the great captains of industry, then enjoying their heyday, ought not to be hampered in their projects and that the statute contravened some inexorable law of business growth. At the same time an even more ominous opinion was, from time to time, expressed, and somewhat widely entertained, that it was idle to expect any real restraint through the courts upon the corrupt or illegal transactions of those of great wealth.

To the rising tide of popular resentment at the orgy of industrial combinations, in apparent defiance of the law, which characterized the closing years of the last century, President Roosevelt made such notable contributions that neither calumny nor political detraction can ever obscure the just fame due him by reason thereof. In clarion tones he declaimed against malefactors of great wealth. He did more. He determined to set the law in motion against them. In his Attorney General, the late Senator Knox, he had at hand a man preeminently fitted for the Herculean task. Tried in many a forensic battle, familiar with the intricacies of corporate organization and finance, moved neither by fear nor ambition, he brought to it a highly trained and marvelously well-balanced mind. It was no ordinary achievement when the darling project of James J. Hill, Empire Builder, for the consolidation of three great railroad systems, apparently accomplished, was brought to naught through the process of the courts. To the litigation through which this result was attained in all its stages Attorney General Knox gave his personal attention. He made the argument for the Government before the Supreme Court, and the brief submitted on its behalf bears every evidence of being a product of his superb intellect. The Northern Securities Co. case was epoch-making in more senses than one.

Concurrently, with the well-directed efforts of the department to arrest and undo the work of the frenzied financiers, there proceeded a vigorous and determined campaign against the illegal appropriators of the public domain, with results quite in contrast with anything theretofore attained in that line. He made it unsafe for rich or poor to pillage the national inheritance and earned the gratitude of those most immediately concerned in the preservation of the same for the orderly development of the public land States. Relentlessly he pursued the Greene and Gaynor cases, through their international ramifications, until justice was satisfied. His constructive talents as a lawyer were brilliantly exhibited in the negotiations through which the French title to the Panama Canal was acquired and in the legislation through which the Interstate Commerce Commission was made an effective agency for the regulation and control of railroad rates, in connection with which his aid was sought and his valuable assistance publicly acknowledged by Senators interested.

The service rendered by our departed brother as Secretary of State and as a Member of this body confirmed the high opinion the country had formed of him as a lawyer and a statesman from the manner in which he discharged the duties of the office of Attorney General. He was in his element when he essayed to canvass the most serious and profound questions of international and constitutional law. It was an intellectual treat to listen to him dissect such and lay bare the determinative principle involved.

Turn him to any cause of policy,
The Gordian knot of it he would unloose
Familiar as his garter.

He had none of the meretricious arts of the orator, but there was a singular impressiveness in his speech which, with the irresistible logic of his argument and the well-earned reputation he enjoyed as a master of any subject on which he spoke, invariably held the attention of the Senate—a rare tribute to his eloquence. Though somewhat diminutive in stature, he had a remarkably commanding presence not rare in physically small men of unusual intellectual power.

As in the case of Chatham, regret was often expressed that he did not more frequently illumine the dark places in the national pathway. It is well known that he declined official honors of the most tempting character, yet he had one ambition, as I can testify. He once confided to me that he came back to the Senate, finding the pursuit of a private business unsatisfying—from a desire to render some service to the public rather than to end his days in amassing or adding to a private fortune. He was one of the great men of his time whose career adds to the luster of the great body which to-day does honor to his memory.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, all democratic governments are essentially and in their very essence party governments. In such governments it is inevitable, in fact the party system requires that there should be great political leaders, guides, and managers. Senator PENROSE had the qualifications of a great party manager and a great political leader, and in a parliamentary system of government different from ours he would undoubtedly, as the head of the Republican party, have been the prime minister.

While I served longer with Senator PENROSE than with Senator Knox, I never became so intimate with him as I did with Senator Knox. It was not his fault, but rather mine. I shall therefore leave it to others to pay tribute to the great part he played in the political and legislative life of the nation, and shall speak more particularly of the distinguished public career and eminent services of Senator KNOX.

Senator Knox died on the 12th of October, 1921, in the 69th year of his age. During the comparatively brief span of his life, he rendered great and most efficient service to our country in positions of the highest trust. He was Attorney General of the United States from April 5, 1901, until July 5, 1904, three and one-fourth years in all. He was a United States Senator from Pennsylvania for two separate periods; the first from July 1, 1904, to March 4, 1909, nearly five years. The second period extended from November, 1916, to the date of his death, a period of nearly five years. He was Secretary of State from March 4, 1909, until March 5, 1913, four years in all. In short, he was a cabinet officer for over seven years, and a United States Senator for nearly ten years—seventeen years in all in the public service of the Federal Government.

Before he entered the public service he had, by education, training and practice, based upon mental qualities of the highest order, become a most learned and profound lawyer, one of the foremost in the country, of national reputation. It was my good fortune to be associated with him on the Judiciary Committee of the Senate during his first Senatorial period, and on the Committee on Rules during his second Senatorial period. On account of this association with him, I became quite familiar with his great legal ability and his profound knowledge of public affairs.

I remember very well when his nomination for Attorney General was first sent to the Senate and referred to the Judiciary Committee. Objections were filed against his confirmation on the ground that he had been the attorney for the so-called "Steel Trust." In respect to those charges, he preserved a dignified silence and made no answer. The upshot of the matter, however, was that he was in due course of time confirmed.

As Attorney General, he conducted the legal business of the Government with energy and ability, and, while it was customary for the Solicitor General to argue most cases in the Supreme Court, I remember very well that in the matter of the noted Northern Securities case he made the argument in the case on behalf of the Government. It was my good fortune to listen to his argument, which was a most powerful and able one, and, as to all important points, he was sustained in his views by the decision of the Supreme Court.

As Secretary of State he demonstrated his wonderful ability, the wide scope of his vision and learning, and his splendid attainments as a diplomat. So comprehensive was his outlook on world affairs and so vigorous his method of handling his country's foreign relations that he proved himself a most worthy successor to Secretary Hay. His state papers were remarkably clear, pertinent, and most effective. Our foreign affairs could not have been in better hands than his.

As a member of this body, he proved himself to be one of the leaders. He was an exceedingly clear, incisive, and powerful speaker and debater. He did not indulge in any flimsy subterfuge or mere surplusage, nor was he given to any pyrotechnics. His statements and arguments were most convincing, and were more in line with an argument such as a good lawyer presents to the Supreme Court, rather than the addresses which are ordinarily delivered in this body. When he spoke, he was always listened to with attention. His statement of a case was always so perfect and illuminating that after it was made, there was little occasion for further argument to be made.

Pennsylvania has had many great and able Senators in this body, but none of them has in any respect outranked Senator Knox. It often happens that men of great mental ability and high attainments are little inclined to be companionable and agreeable in their associations when off duty. This was not the case with Senator Knox. He was one of the most genial, sociable, and companionable of men and contact with him was a delight to his associates in the Senate.

While a member of the Cabinet, he was always ready and willing to listen to Senators and Members of the House with attention, and aimed to be helpful. No one could ever say of him that he had any of the qualities that are sometimes ascribed to public officials; that is, that he met others in the guise of an iceberg. He always aimed to be helpful, and if it sometimes happened that Senators were diffident about approaching him on public questions, instead of meeting them in a cold and formal way, he always endeavored to put them on the right track and to guide them as far as he could. In other words, while he strove to do his full duty as a public official, at the same time he made every effort to meet his colleagues in a friendly spirit, with a disposition to help rather than to obstruct.

Few men have ever entered the public service, either in a legislative or an executive capacity, better equipped intellectually and by training and education than Senator Knox. While his intellectual qualities were of the highest order, his moral sense of right and wrong was equally acute. He was morally incapable of taking a dishonest or unjust course, either in public or private affairs. He possessed that high standard of character which is the lodestar to success in the public service. His life stands out as a memorial not only of what he wrought and accomplished in the service of our Government, but it also stands out most clearly as a guide to our coming generation of statesmen and public servants.

He was in every respect an able, honest, and fearless public servant, having the welfare of his country always uppermost in his heart and affections. His death was a great loss to his State, his country, and the American people; and we, his associates here in the Senate, because of our intimate relations with him, mourn his loss with the utmost feeling and sincerity. The man and his work, what he wrought and accomplished, together with his sterling character, form a guide which will be an inspiration for future generations.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, it is with great regret that I announce that by reason of a sudden illness the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] is unable to be present to-day to address the Senate as he had expected to do; but he had reduced his intended remarks to writing, and, therefore, I ask unanimous consent that they may be printed in the Record in the usual 8-point type.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PEPPER in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, it is the sad good fortune of Senators who served with them to be privileged to commemorate in this Chamber the services of the great dead who here rendered their last services to the country. These exercises are no less a consecration of the living than a commemoration of the dead. Here we rededicate the living to the future as we recall the memories not only of those whom to-day we assemble to honor, but of patriots who went before them.

Among the many men who have sat in the Senate of the United States, there are a few whose learning, foresight, courage, and prudence united to distinguish them as statesmen. Such was PHILANDER KNOX. He was a statesman; he was a man; an American whose career typified the quality and the opportunity which we proudly deem characteristic of America and Americans. He fashioned his own career. His talents, his purposes, his character, won for him the true learning which marked him for the jurist he was. A great lawyer, he came into public life as Attorney General for the people of the United States. There are others here and elsewhere who because of their own learning in the law and knowledge of PHILANDER KNOX as a lawyer will dwell upon his legal attainments and his services as Attorney General; but there are some of us who knew better, and therefore the more admired, his wisdom in the field of foreign affairs, both as Secretary of State and as a Senator of the United States.

Is it not remarkable that 15 years ago he comprehended, as we all comprehend to-day, the dangers which threatened peace and equal opportunity for commerce in parts of the world as widely separated as eastern Asia and the Isthmus between the two Americas? His concern for the integrity of China and the security of Manchuria was a development of the policy of his predecessor, John Hay. In Central America he manifested an active and wise solicitude for the peace, liberty, and prosperity of the people of those small States who have suffered so often and so long from civil disorders. In eastern Asia he pursued a policy, in Central America he inaugurated a policy, both of which in principle our Government follows to-day. His vision, his prudence, his incomparable capacity for profound study and fruitful reflection, were manifested again, and no less strikingly, when he presented to the Senate his analysis of the treaties and his forecast of their economic and political consequences. It would be repugnant to the spirit of this occasion to dwell upon a controversial matter, but it is permissible to recall the grave respect and almost somber attention with which the crowded Senate Chamber listened to that analysis.

It is too soon, perhaps, to appraise at its precise value the part PHILANDER KNOX played in determining the development of our national policy during the fierce controversy in which all of us, his colleagues and friends here, had some part ourselves. This we all know: That his judgment was far more determining, his influence far more pervasive, than the country or the world understood. Through those long months of strife he pursued his purpose, unperturbed and imperturbable. No word of bitterness passed his lips. Serene, calm, kindly, affectionate among his fellows here, the true quality of his character was never more manifest than at that time. He held the friendship and the affection of those whom he opposed no less than those who were agreed with him, and gave friendship and affection, measure for measure, in return.

How generous he was; how loyal and unfaltering! He bore success and disappointment with equal calm. He faced the oncoming death, of which he knew and we knew not, as dauntless, smiling, as he had faced the trials of life. God keep his memory living! He was a great American.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, the whole Nation felt the passing of the men whose names are to-day upon our lips. Not alone Pennsylvania, but each of her sister States, realized that their death spelt loss for all America. For us now to try, by our single voices, to give adequate expression to that sense of national loss seems wholly impossible. Their lives of conspicuous service, their records in the annals of the Nation, their vivid impression upon the memories of all our people, coupled with the realization of their absence to-day, make a more eloquent appeal than can be made by the tongues of us who mourn them.

Of Senator PENROSE I can tell little that all the world does not already know. His unique position in Pennsylvania and in the Senate, his influence upon both State and National Governments, and his record of public service are in the memory of all Americans. I knew him very slightly and I can not add to what my colleague has so ably said of him as a man and as a devoted servant of his country.

Of Senator Knox, however, I can speak with far fuller knowledge. He was my father's partner before I was born, and that partnership continued until Mr. Knox entered public service in President McKinley's Cabinet in 1901. I can speak of him from the standpoint of the awe-stricken small boy toward his distinguished neighbor, of the admiring law student toward his preceptor, and of the practicing lawyer toward his illustrious senior.

His mind was a clear window, that neither tinted nor clouded what passed through it. What his mind absorbed came to him without a tinge of illusion, without distortion by prejudice or self-conceit. What thought he expressed was expressed with singular clarity, without affectation, without cant, without reiteration. To the public service he gave the same sanity, the same sincerity, that he gave to his private professional work. He was the very antithesis of the demagogue. The law of his State is the better because he took part in molding it, the Federal law is stronger and more effective because he took part at times in making it and at other times in enforcing it, and the foreign policy of our Nation is wiser because he helped to frame it.

Mr. Knox was born at Brownsville, Fayette County, Pa., on May 6, 1853, the son of David S. and Rebecca Page Knox. His father was a banker, his grandfather a Methodist Episcopal minister, and both of them had held the high respect of the community. He studied at the Brownsville schools and at Mount Union College in Ohio, from which he graduated in 1872. While at Mount Union he formed a friendship with William McKinley, who was then district attorney of Stark County, a friendship which lasted until the assassination of President McKinley in 1901. He was admitted to the bar of Allegheny County, Pa., at Pittsburgh in 1875, and having formed a partnership with James H. Reed, under the name of Knox & Reed, he practiced law continuously until 1901.

His professional skill was remarkable, and long before his appointment as Attorney General he had come to be recognized as one of the ablest forensic lawyers in the United States. His practice was varied and was not confined to any branch of the law. I do not believe that there has ever been at the American bar any lawyer with a more remarkable power of lucid expression of legal principles than PHILANDER CHASE KNOX.

It was natural that President McKinley should have selected Mr. Knox as his Attorney General, both because of the warm personal friendship that had long existed between them and because of Mr. Knox's conspicuous position at the American bar; and upon President McKinley's death in the fall of 1901 it was natural that President Roosevelt should have asked Mr. Knox to remain in the same position.

His accomplishments as Attorney General from 1901 until his resignation in 1904 were remarkable. Through his genius the Government attained a sweeping victory in the National Securities case and thereby galvanized the Sherman antitrust law into real existence. By his ability in analysis was determined the policy on which the United States tried and won the Alaska boundary case, one of the most important international cases in which our country has ever been involved. The acquisition of the Panama Canal from its French owners was wholly carried out under his direction. His influence in the Cabinet of President Roosevelt, both while he was Attorney General and after he had resigned to accept the Senatorship, was most important.

In June, 1904, Mr. Knox was appointed United States Senator from Pennsylvania to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Senator Quay and his appointment was followed by his election for the full term. His service in the Senate was interrupted by President Taft summoning him in 1909 to become Secretary of State, which position he filled with conspicuous distinction until the end of the Taft administration in March, 1913. After three years of respite from public service, Mr. Knox was again elected to the United States Senate in 1916, where he became and continued until his death to be one of the strongest figures in the Senate. As chairman of the Committee on Rules and as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, his influence in the Senate was very great.

His service was characterized by an utter absence of any effort to cater to a whim of the moment. His gaze never wavered from what he considered to be his country's best interest, and I do not believe that he ever wondered, and I am certain that he never cared, whether at the moment what he did brought popular applause.

Of Senator Knox's home life it would be presumption for me to speak at length. We can not know and we can with difficulty surmise what his loss has meant to his widow, to his daughter, and to his sons. But we may be sure that through their sorrow shines a great pride in the remembrance of the greatness of him whose hands they upheld throughout the long period of his public service.

A member of the Cabinets of three successive Presidents; a Senator of the United States, once appointed and twice elected; a leader of the bar of his native State, Mr. Knox in his lifetime had high honors heaped upon him; but it can truthfully be said that his service ever outran the rewards that he received; that his record is marked deeply upon the history of our country; and that his loss can not be made good.

I wish now, Mr. President, to speak of another distinguished son of Fayette County, Pa., Senator WILLIAM EVANS CROW, late senior United States Senator from Pennsylvania; and in speaking of him I can only wish that I had greater power of expression and that I could make the members of this body, who knew him so slightly, realize his ability, his charm, and his remarkable personality as I myself learned them from long acquaintance. If Senator Crow had not been gravely stricken soon after his appointment to the Senate, his brethren here would have learned to know him and admire him as we in Pennsylvania had already learned.

The senatorship had been his ambition for many years, but a cruel fate struck him down almost at the moment when that ambition was attained. If he had been able to serve here as he had served in the senate of Pennsylvania I have no doubt whatever but that he would have attained the same success in the broader field that he had so conspicuously obtained in his home State.

Senator Crow was born in Fayette County, Pa., March 10, 1870; he was educated in the normal school and at Waynesburg College, and was admitted to the bar of his home county in 1895. He served as assistant district attorney and then as district attorney of that county with great efficiency, and in his private practice rapidly rose to distinction. He was among the leaders at a bar noted for its able members. In 1906 he was elected to the senate of Pennsylvania, and he was re-elected in 1910, 1914, and 1918; for two sessions he was president pro tempore of that body, and it was there that his great ability became apparent and he rose to leadership in the counsels of the senate. Not only did he have a sound knowledge of the law and a correct understanding of governmental problems, but he had a mastery of details and an inexhaustible energy that added greatly to his effectiveness. Although he was one of the finest orators that ever sat in the Pennsylvania senate, he seldom made formal speeches.

The charm of his manner struck every one; he had, to a greater extent than almost any man I have ever known, that faculty of giving kindly attention to the claims of others, when his own mind was overflowing with anxiety, when his brain and nerves were oppressed with pressure of work; in other words, he was never too busy to listen, never too busy to be kindly and patient, never deaf to importunity.

Mr. Crow owned many farms which he managed with conspicuous success; his cattle, his sheep, and his crops were dear to his heart. Whatever his activities, whether in politics at Harrisburg, in the practice of law at Uniontown, or in his farm work at Chalk Hill, he carried into what he was doing the same uncommon ability, the same patience, and the same friendliness. The number of his friends and admirers was legion. His funeral, which took place from his country home on August 7, 1922, was one of the most remarkable outpourings of friends from all parts of Pennsylvania and elsewhere that has ever been seen.

I will not try in my own words to epitomize Senator Crow's character, because I feel that no effort of mine could equal the glowing eloquence of the Senator's friend, Dr. William Harrison Spence, who spoke at his funeral. From Doctor Spence's beautiful tribute I take these sentences:

Personality—that vague, indefinable something that singles out one from the many, establishes distinction, is assertive yet attractive, giving an unmistakable sense of the possessor being all there at every moment and at every point of his contact with people and affairs—one could not but feel that Senator Crow was a personality, a force within himself, compelling and virile, moved more from within than without, daring to think his own thoughts and repose upon his own convictions.

This qualified him for leadership, endowed him with initiative. Leadership came to him as a birthright. Nature intended him to be a leader.

He possessed personal qualities that drew people to him—that, because he was lovable, kindly, and sympathetic.

By these he led quite as much as by special abilities to command, exceptional though these were.

Kindly of disposition by nature, he preferred to be generous and to be attentive to the interests of others, a trait most easily misconstrued, especially in a public man, to be but a means to one's own ambitious ends. But those who knew Senator Crow well and could impartially judge knew that his kindliness was not assumed nor motivated by sinister purpose. It was his own disposition functioning naturally. Never too tired to listen to the wants of others, however humble of station, never too busy to make attempt to relieve them.

What Doctor Spence has thus expressed so gracefully is the thought of thousands of men throughout Pennsylvania to-day. They know, because they knew Senator Crow, how great was the loss of the United States Senate in his inability to remain to take part in its deliberations.

And now I have finished. Pennsylvania has suffered mightily in the loss of these three great men, and she will continue to feel that loss for years to come. It is fitting that they should be held high in the memory of their beloved country, to whose service they gave the best that was in them.

Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to, and the Senate (at 12 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Monday, January 29, 1923, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

Monday, January 29, 1923.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Gracious God, as we assume the duties belonging to us this day we would ask Thy blessing. Thou dost kindly care for us in the manifold experiences of life, and Thou dost expect from us the best service we can render. We therefore ask that to-day it may be made evident that the duties are performed according to Thy good pleasure and that the welfare of the country is constantly conserved thereby. We humbly ask in Jesus' name. Amen.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

CALL OF THE ROLL.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Glass	Lodge	Page
Bayard	Gooding	McCormick	Philpps
Borah	Hale	McCumber	Pomerene
Brookhart	Harrell	McKellar	Reed, Pa.
Bursum	Harris	McKinley	Shields
Cameron	Harrison	McLean	Smoot
Capper	Hefflin	McNary	Stanfield
Caraway	Hitchcock	Moses	Sterling
Colt	Johnson	Myers	Sutherland
Couzens	Jones, Wash.	Nelson	Trammell
Culberson	Kellogg	New	Underwood
Curtis	Kendrick	Nicholson	Wadsworth
Dillingham	King	Norbeck	Walsh, Mass.
Ernst	Ladd	Norris	Walsh, Mont.
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Oddie	Warren
George	Lenroot	Overman	Weller

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to state that the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] is necessarily absent, confined to his home on account of illness. The Senator from Texas, I suppose, has attended the roll calls of the Senate more diligently than any other Senator in the body. He regrets very much his inability to be present to-day, and I want the RECORD to show during his illness that he is missing the roll call and breaking his excellent record in that regard only because he is confined to his bed at home.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] and the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] are necessarily absent, being engaged in a conference on the national bank tax bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is necessarily absent on account of illness.

Mr. CAPPER. I wish to announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER (S. DOC. NO. 294).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Public Printer, transmitting, pursuant to law, the annual report of the operations of the Government Printing Office for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1922, which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

RENTS RECEIVED BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IN THE DISTRICT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, submitted pursuant to law, as to the rents received from properties located on sites of proposed public buildings purchased by the United States in the city of Washington, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

DEPARTMENTAL USE OF AUTOMOBILES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster General in response to Senate Resolution 399, agreed to January 6, 1923, reporting relative to the number and cost of maintenance of passenger-carrying automobiles in use by the Post Office Department, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, in response to Senate Resolution 399, agreed to January 6, 1923, reporting relative to the number and cost of maintenance of passenger-carrying automobiles in use by the committee, which was ordered to lie on the table.

SENATOR FROM NEW YORK.

Mr. WADSWORTH presented the credentials of ROYAL S. COPELAND, chosen a Senator from the State of New York for the term beginning March 4, 1923, which were read and ordered to be placed on the file, as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK,
Executive Department.

To the President of the Senate of the United States:

This is to certify that on the 7th day of November, 1922, ROYAL S. COPELAND was duly chosen by the qualified electors of the State of New York a Senator from said State in the Senate of the United States for a term of six years, beginning on the 4th day of March, 1923.

Witness his excellency our governor, Alfred E. Smith, and our seal affixed at Albany this 24th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1923.

[SEAL.]

By the governor:

ALFRED E. SMITH, Governor.

JAMES A. HAMILTON,
Secretary of State.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution of the Central Citizens' Association, of Washington, D. C., favoring the passage of legislation granting the citizens of Washington the right to select their own administrative officers and protesting against alleged intolerable conditions in the District of Columbia, especially the operation of public utilities apparently for the purpose of furnishing fixed and excessive incomes to the utility corporations rather than for service to the people, operation on the public streets of "one man" cars, etc., which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. NELSON. I present a petition, numerously signed, by sundry citizens of Mankato, Minn., praying that the Congress extend immediate aid to the people of the German and Austrian Republics. It is claimed in the petition that the people of Germany and Austria are suffering and that this Government should be asked to appropriate money for their relief. Several other petitions on the same subject by inadvertence were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McNARY presented the following memorial of the Oregon State Senate, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

STATE OF OREGON,
THIRTY-SECOND LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY, REGULAR SESSION,
Senate Chamber.

Senate Memorial No. 2.

To the Members of the Congress of the United States:

Whereas the demand for and issuance of tax-exempt securities has resulted in greatly extending the burden of debt now outstanding against the several States and political subdivisions thereof; and

Whereas the continued increase of these securities will result in still further withdrawing from productive business funds needed therefor; and

Whereas the holders of said tax-exempt securities do not now bear, through taxation, their full share of the costs of government; and

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States legislation prohibiting the further issuance of tax-exempt securities: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Oregon, That we most earnestly petition and memorialize the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Washington assembled, in the name of the State of Oregon, that Congress submit a constitutional amendment which will prohibit the further issuance of the tax-exempt securities; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Oregon be instructed to forward a copy of this resolution to each of the Members of the Congress of the United States.

Adopted by the senate January 18, 1923.

JAY UPTON,
President of the Senate.

Indorsed: Senate Memorial No. 2. Introduced by Senators Dennis, Corbett, and Ritzer. Jno. P. Hunt, chief clerk. Filed January 19, 1923. Sam A. Kozer, secretary of state.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
STATE OF OREGON,
Office of the Secretary of State.

I, Sam A. Kozer, secretary of state of the State of Oregon, and custodian of the seal of said State, do hereby certify:

That I have carefully compared the annexed copy of Senate Memorial No. 2 with the original thereof adopted by the senate of the Thirty-second Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon and filed in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Oregon January 19, 1923, and that the same is a full, true, and complete transcript therefrom and of the whole thereof, together with all indorsements thereon.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed hereto the seal of the State of Oregon. Done at the capitol, at Salem, Oreg., this 19th day of January, A. D. 1923.

[SEAL]

SAM A. KOZER,
Secretary of State.

Mr. KENDRICK. I present a petition of citizens of Cody, Wyo., alleging that paragraph 7, section 900, of the internal revenue act, placing a tax on small-arms ammunition and fire-arms, is discriminatory, and praying for its repeal. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KENDRICK. I present a resolution adopted by the Central Labor Union of Rock Springs, Wyo., favoring the passage of legislation suspending immigration for a period of five years, at the end of that time a general naturalization day to take place for those who are fit to become citizens, and those who are not fit to be deported at once, and provision to be made for those who have wives and children in foreign lands who have become citizens, which I move be referred to the Committee on Immigration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NICHOLSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Denver, Colo., praying for the passage of legislation extending immediate aid to the famine-stricken peoples of the German and Austrian Republics, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MCLEAN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Hartford, Conn., praying for the passage of legislation extending immediate aid to the famine-stricken peoples of the German and Austrian Republics, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of Camp Alfred C. Alford, No. 15, Department of Kansas, United Spanish-American War Veterans; Ladies Auxillary, United Spanish-American War Veterans; Grand Army of the Republic; Women's Relief Corps; American Legion, and Ladies' Auxillary, all of Iola, Kans., praying for the passage of the bill (S. 4142) to amend the war risk insurance act and the rehabilitation act with amendments prior to the passage of this act, extending all of the provisions of this act to all disabled veterans of all wars of the United States and to their dependents, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LADD presented a petition of sundry citizens of Leigh, Elgin, and Pretty Rock, all in the State of North Dakota, praying for the passage of legislation extending immediate aid to the famine-stricken peoples of the German and Austrian Republics, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution of the Tagus Federal Farm Loan Association of Tagus, N. Dak., protesting against the passage of the so-called Strong bill, amending certain sections of the Federal farm loan act, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

THE COAL SHORTAGE.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I present a petition requesting the enactment of legislation providing for an embargo upon the exportation of coal during the present coal crisis. The petition, sent me by the Boston American, is signed by 34 of the 40 members of the Senate and 69 members of the House of Representatives of the Massachusetts Legislature. I ask that the petition be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and a copy of it be forwarded to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which commission has authority, in my opinion, without further legislation, under section 2 of the emergency coal act approved September 22, 1922, to declare an embargo under certain conditions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

IMPURITIES IN COAL SUPPLY.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I also present a communication from the State fuel administrator of the State of Wisconsin, calling attention to the extent to which impurities are found in the shipments of coal to that section of the country. I called the attention of the Senate a few days ago to similar conditions in and complaints from Massachusetts. The writer suggests some remedial legislation be adopted by the National Government. I think it is a very helpful contribution to the discussion upon the subject of coal legislation to prevent future famines of and inferior quality of this very necessary product. I ask that the petition be printed in the Record and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and a copy of it sent to the Federal Fuel Commission. The Federal Fuel Commission should and undoubtedly will consider in its survey of this industry this important phase of the coal question. Inferior and impure coal selling at excessively high prices is adding to the widespread resentment of the American people, caused by the present coal shortage and inadequate fuel transportation facilities. Some method of standardization must be adopted to protect our people against this form of deceit and fraud.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order requested by the Senator from Massachusetts will be made.

The communication is as follows:

WISCONSIN STATE COAL COMMITTEE,
Madison, January 25, 1923.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WALSH: Knowing how deeply you have interested yourself in the question of coal production and distribution and its relation to the consuming public of the entire Nation, I thought possibly some views that I hold would be received in the right spirit. The points I intend to bring out may have already been embodied in legislation you have in mind.

At the present time the consuming public of the United States places an order with his dealer for a ton or more, whatever the case may be, of egg, stove, chestnut, pea, or buckwheat. The order is delivered as specified, but in very few instances does the consumer get what he has purchased. For instance, if the order calls for a ton of chestnut it is a safe bet that that ton of chestnut contains at least 10 per cent, if not more, pea; if pea is ordered it contains a large percentage of buckwheat, and so on.

Then again, there is no restriction of any kind as to grade. Cars of coal from the anthracite fields are carrying a greater percentage of impurities than ever before—slate, bone, clinker, and refuse comprising the major portion of these impurities. When Mr. Consumer pays for his ton of coal he pays for these impurities, which are not only a part of the tonnage but which act as a deterrent on that portion of the ton which is really coal.

The State governments are powerless to act in such cases. The dock companies receiving the coal from the eastern operators must pay for the coal as it is, and they also pay for a certain tonnage of this or that grade. The docks and dealers should not carry the burden.

We have our national pure food laws. There is no one that will not say that fuel (coal) is clothed with as much of a public interest as food. Under the pure food act we are guaranteed that the commodity, whatever it is, is pure, and we pay a price in conformity.

Under our Bureau of Weights and Measures (national) we are guaranteed to receive a certain amount of that commodity which we may have specified.

The eastern operators and shippers at present have "carte blanche" covering both points mentioned. The car or cargo, as the case may be, is loaded up and shipped. It may contain a quality of coal which will meet with entire approval, and then again it may run very high in its proportion of impurities. The fact is, though, that no matter what it contains it is sold as coal; the dealer must take it as such, and in turn he, the dealer, unloads it on the consuming public.

The enactment of Federal legislation is the only cure for the existing conditions.

There are many other evils in the coal industry to-day, both less and greater than those above mentioned, but these two are extant wherever coal is sold.

While on this subject, I want to relate an experience of a Manitowoc coal dealer this week. On January 4 this man received a telegram from the Foreston Coal Co., at Scranton, Pa., offering three cars of chestnut anthracite at $13.25 f. o. b.—an outrageous figure. The dealer had to have coal, irrespective of price. He placed an order for one car, and was informed payment was necessary by wire before shipment would be made. The money was sent. The car was received at Manitowoc last Saturday, and I inspected it on Monday of this week. It is the best collection of slate, bone, and clinker that was ever collected in one single car. There ought to be a way to strangle these exploiters. I have sent all papers and sample of this coal to Mr. Wadleigh, at Washington, and if you are sufficiently interested I know he will be glad to let you have all details.

It was not my intention to tire you out, but was under the impression you might be interested in these views.

Most respectfully yours,

P. H. PRESENTIN,
State Fuel Administrator.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McNARY, from the Committee on Manufactures, to which was referred the bill (S. 4399) to fix standards for hampers, round stave baskets, and splint baskets for fruits and vegetables, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13793) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1068) thereon.

Mr. NORBECK, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (S. 4132) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and to supervise the issuance of securities, and for other purposes," approved April 5, 1918, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1069) thereon.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 3892) authorizing the State of California to bring suit against the United States to determine title to certain lands in Siskiyou County, Calif., reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1070) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 4432) granting an increase of pension to John L. Dick (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 4433) to designate the times and places of holding terms of the United States District Court for the District of Montana; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McCORMICK:

A bill (S. 4434) declaring a portion of the west fork of the South Branch of the Chicago River in Cook County, Ill., to be a nonnavigable stream; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 4435) amending the provision contained in the sundry civil act approved July 19, 1919 (41 Stat. L. 164), for the remodeling and repair of the customhouse and post office at Buffalo, N. Y.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (S. 4436) conferring jurisdiction upon certain courts of the United States to hear and determine the claim by the owner of the steamship City of Beaumont against the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 4437) to amend section 284 of the Judicial Code of the United States; and

A bill (S. 4438) to amend section 1025 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CARAWAY:

A bill (S. 4439) to revive and reenact an act entitled "An act granting the consent of Congress for the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across the Arkansas River between the cities of Little Rock and Argenta, Ark.," approved October 6, 1917; to the Committee on Commerce.

ADMISSION TO THE UNITED STATES OF CERTAIN PERSIAN NATIVES.

Mr. RANDELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4092) providing for the admission into the United States of certain refugees from near eastern countries, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration and ordered to be printed.

RURAL-CREDIT FACILITIES.

Mr. BROOKHART submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States, to amend the Federal farm loan act, to amend the Federal reserve act, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. HARRISON submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States, to amend the Federal farm loan act, to amend the Federal reserve act, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE—WARREN C. HODGKINS.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from further consideration of the bill (S. 4416) for the relief of Warren C. Hodgkins, and it was referred to the Committee on Claims.

INVESTIGATION OF GREAT LAKES-GULF OF MEXICO WATERWAY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Pursuant to Senate Resolution 411, agreed to on the calendar day of January 25, 1923, providing a committee to investigate and report upon the problem for a 9-foot channel in the waterway from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, the Chair appoints the following Senators: Mr. McCORMICK, Mr. REED of Pennsylvania, Mr. BROOKHART, Mr. McKELLAR, and Mr. BROUSSARD.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I move that the bill which I introduced on Saturday last to repeal that portion of the Federal reserve act which provides for a progressive interest rate be now referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama moves that the bill which he introduced on Saturday, being the bill (S. 4427) repealing the act approved April 13, 1920, entitled "An act to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act," be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SMOOT. Is morning business closed, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business has not yet been declared closed, but the Chair is ready to declare that morning business is closed.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I filed an objection on Saturday last to the reference of the bill introduced by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], and I assumed it was understood there should be a vote of the Senate on the question of reference this morning. If it is necessary that I file another objection to the reference of the bill, as requested by the Senator from Alabama, I now do so.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut can not make an objection, because the agreement was had on Saturday that if I would permit the matter to go over until to-day we should have a vote as to what disposition should be made of the measure. In accordance with that agreement I have moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. President, I wish to repeat what I have previously stated, that the progressive interest rate was charged nowhere except in the agricultural sections of the South and West. It never was applied in the East and the North. The agricultural sections having been so injuriously affected by it, I felt that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, which particularly has in charge the interests of the agricultural people of the country, ought to have jurisdiction of the measure.

There is not anything complicated about the subject. It does not require a knowledge of banking technique or anything of that sort. The progressive interest rate was applied only, as I have stated, to the agricultural sections of the country, and the agricultural sections were made greatly to suffer under it. Now, those who favor the bill which I have introduced wish to take out of the act the section under which a progressive interest rate may be charged; that is all. I can not think that many Senators would vote against taking it out. The rediscount rate has been reduced, just as I had suggested in my resolution it should be reduced and as others also have suggested. While that rate has been reduced, the progressive interest rate provision is still in the law, and I wish to have it taken out so that it may not be resorted to in the future. It ought not to remain in the law. What I am seeking to do by the enactment of the bill I have introduced is simply to repeal that section of the Federal reserve act. So I move that my bill be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the merits of the bill which has been introduced by the Senator from Alabama. The Senator on Saturday last moved that his bill, which proposes to repeal that portion of section 14 of the Federal reserve act which relates to the progressive discount rate, be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and he has this morning renewed that motion. I happened on Saturday to be in the Chamber at the time the Senator from Alabama made his request, and the request was such a flagrant violation of the long-established procedure of the Senate that I conceived it to be my duty to object.

The Senator from Alabama then stated that I ought not to put any obstacle in the way of his request, because similar references of other measures had frequently been made. That is true. A short time ago a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was, on the request of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, referred to that committee, if my recollection is correct; and that joint resolution was subsequently favorably reported by the committee and is now upon the calendar.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the time has arrived when the chairmen of the committees of the Senate should know whether acquiescence by the Senate in these irregular references is to become a permanent policy, and that in the future bills are to be referred with an eye single to the friendliness of the committee to the measure and without regard to the subject matter involved. It seems to me that the time has arrived when the Senate should go on record with regard to this matter. It is an important matter.

I confess that I was somewhat surprised, when the joint resolution proposing to amend the Constitution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, that some member of the Judiciary Committee or some one of the parliamentary leaders of the Senate did not object and call attention to the fact that if this habit is to become confirmed it will result in the demoralization of the whole legislative procedure of the Senate.

Mr. President, there is nothing I dislike more than this sort of a controversy. The question of reference is of no consequence to me personally. The Senate knows that the reasons assigned for this reference by the Senator from Alabama are without foundation. The particular amendment to the Federal reserve act which the Senator from Alabama now desires to have repealed was proposed by me at the request of the Federal Reserve Board. The Federal Reserve Board at that time was composed entirely of Democrats; the administration of the law was Democratic; and yet, Mr. President, the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which a majority was Republican, felt that it was its duty to give serious consideration to any request from the Federal Reserve Board. It did so, and favorably reported the bill, and it was passed by Congress.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McLEAN. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. A moment ago the Senator from Connecticut referred to a joint resolution proposing a certain amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which joint resolution had been referred to the Committee on Agriculture. I desire to make a brief statement in reference to that matter.

The joint resolution proposed an amendment of the Constitution to dispense with presidential electors and to provide for a direct vote of the people for President. At the last session of Congress the Senator from Nebraska introduced a similar joint resolution contemplating such an amendment, and accompanied it with a statement on the floor. At his suggestion that joint resolution was referred to the Judiciary Committee, of which he is a member, and, on his own request, I appointed him chairman of a subcommittee to consider the joint resolution proposing the constitutional amendment. That joint resolution is still pending before the Judiciary Committee and is still in the hands of the subcommittee of which the Senator from Nebraska is chairman.

At this session of Congress the Senator from Nebraska introduced another joint resolution having in view the same object. It was done at a time when I was not present in the Senate; at all events, it escaped my attention. The Senator from Nebraska had that joint resolution proposing the same constitutional amendment referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and from that committee he succeeded in securing a report on the joint resolution. I have been patiently waiting for him, as chairman of the subcommittee, to submit a report to the full Judiciary Committee on the joint resolution which he introduced and had referred to that committee and which is still pending there.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I have said about all I care to say upon this question. Every Senator understands that if I should present an argument in defense of my position that argument would be futile, because any Senator who believes that the bill introduced by the Senator from Alabama should be referred to the Committee on Agriculture is in a state of mind that will not be changed by anything anyone may say.

I realize that the Senator from Alabama is deeply interested in this subject. We listen daily to his diatribes and strictures directed to what he calls the deflation policy; but, Mr. President, I wish to insist that if mistakes were made in the administration of the Federal reserve act, they were not made by the Committee on Banking and Currency; they were not made by Republicans.

I have in my hand the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1920. Mr. John Skelton Williams was at that time comptroller. He was ex officio a member of the Federal Reserve Board; and in his report, page 52, he said:

Largely through the aid and excellent functioning of the Federal reserve system, the business and banking interests of the country have passed successfully through the perils of inflation and the strain and losses of deflation without panic and without the demoralization which has been produced in the past at various times from far less serious and racking causes. Those banking and other interests which at the outset so vigorously opposed the Federal reserve system are now among its warmest advocates.

Mark this language:

The several amendments which, since its passage in 1913, have been made to the law as a result of experience have materially added to its use and efficiency.

Among those amendments is the one now objected to by the Senator from Alabama; and the records show that the Comptroller of the Currency, who was at that time a member of the Federal Reserve Board, approved and praised all of the amendments that were adopted.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, what is the date of that report?

Mr. McLEAN. December, 1920.

As I said at the outset, I do not propose to discuss the merits of this question; but I do think that the time has come when flagrant violations of the long-established, and I believe wisely established, legislative procedure in this body should be taken cognizance of and either approved or disapproved, in order that the chairmen of committees may know in the future whether or not it is their duty to object to references of the sort now insisted upon by the Senator from Alabama; and I move, Mr. President, that the motion of the Senator from Alabama be amended—

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator can not make that motion, Mr. President.

Mr. McLEAN. I move, as a substitute, that the bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I make a point of order against that motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken. No amendment is in order except to refer with instructions.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. CURTIS. I understood the Chair to state upon Saturday, when this question was up, that the motion was to refer the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency; and, as I recall the RECORD, the Senator moved to amend by adding instructions that they be required to report out within five days.

Mr. HEFLIN. No, Mr. President; the Senator from Connecticut said that he had not made a motion. I thought he had. He said he had not made a motion.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator from Alabama is right about that.

Mr. HEFLIN. I said I moved to amend his motion by requiring a report on my bill in five days, and he said he had not made it. He did not make it. The RECORD shows he did not make it, and the question that came over was, What disposition would be made of the bill? I obtained the floor before the Senator from Connecticut did and moved to refer it to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; and the Senator from Connecticut can not move to amend that motion, except to instruct that committee what to do with it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In response to the parliamentary inquiry, the Chair did not understand that any motion for reference was made on Saturday last.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Chair is correct about that.

Mr. CURTIS. It was my mistake, because I simply heard what was said by the Senator from Alabama when he said he would offer an amendment directing that the bill be reported back in five days. That misled me.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is true; but the Senator from Connecticut said he had not made the motion.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama is right about that. It makes no difference how the issue is drawn; I am perfectly willing that the vote shall come on the reference of the bill to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Alabama, why can they not agree that the bill shall go to the Committee on Banking and Currency with an understanding that it shall be reported back in five days?

Mr. McLEAN. That is adding insult to injury, and borders on the ridiculous. If the discretion of the committee is to be so limited, I can see no purpose in referring the bill, except to get it before the Senate; and it is now before the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am in sympathy with the bill offered by the Senator from Alabama. I think the act to which he refers ought to be repealed; but I hope he will not press his motion to refer this bill to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Such a practice is going to result in inextricable confusion if Senators are going to ask to have bills referred to committees which they think are most favorable to them, regardless of any reasonable jurisdiction. If there is one fundamental foundation for our organization into committees, it is that bills shall be referred to the committees that are charged with the study of those questions; and I regret to see the effort made to warp that practice into one of getting them referred to committees without regard to their natural jurisdiction.

Personally I am in favor of the bill, and I think there are other Senators on the committee who are in favor of the bill, and I am in favor of an early report on the bill; but I think it is a great mistake for the Senator from Alabama to make an effort to prejudge the case by referring it to a committee that has absolutely no jurisdiction at all over the subject matter.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I know that there are members of the Banking and Currency Committee who will be friendly to this bill. I cast no reflection on any member of the committee. I do not know how the majority of the committee stand on it. I know that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] offered this progressive interest amendment in the outset in 1920. I know that his committee reported it favorably. I know that the majority of his committee, himself among the number, defended the deflation that was carried on under that amendment, and I know that the Senator has objected this morning to being instructed as to bringing this bill out of the committee. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] asked the Senator from Connecticut if he would be willing that this bill go to his committee with the understanding that it would be reported in five days, and he objected to that.

Mr. President, there are not over five lines in this amendment. It is a very short amendment, but it will pluck out of the Federal reserve act one of the most obnoxious and oppressive provisions ever grafted upon any law in the history of this Government. This law was applied by a Republican Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, W. P. G. Harding. The Senator said they were all Democrats. There were three Republicans on it. He himself, Governor Harding, was a Republican. He supported the Republican ticket in 1920, and there were two other Republicans there at that time. Platt was a Republican, and Mitchell was a Republican, as I understand it. The Senator said they were all Democrats. They were not all Democrats by any means.

The Senator has quoted John Skelton Williams in his report as saying that amendments to the bill had been helpful. I do not know whether he had reference to this amendment or not; but he did offer in the board meeting a resolution saying that this progressive interest rate should not reach above 6 per cent, and Governor Harding and the board voted it down. He then offered another resolution saying that it should not exceed 10 per cent, and they voted that down.

I know that John Skelton Williams opposed deflation from the outset. He opposed it on the board, and they had secret meetings after they found he did oppose it and did not let him know when they were meeting to carry out the conspiracy that I charge again was born in Wall Street.

Mr. President, I introduced a resolution here in 1921 to reduce this rediscount rate, and I spoke on it a number of times in the Senate, and some of the newspapers of the country advocated a reduction in the rediscount rate. Mr. Crissinger himself, the Comptroller of the Currency, advocated a reduction of the rediscount rate. We finally succeeded in bringing about a reduction in the rate. While that was going on I did not disturb this provision in the law, because I knew what the friends of that provision thought. They thought if they would reduce the rediscount rate under the demands of my resolution and the fight that I was making, we would forget about the provision and let it sleep in the act, and at some future time they would invoke it again and strike down the legitimate business of the country and make millions and hundreds of millions for Wall Street on some occasion. I knew that. I thought that; so when we got the rediscount rate reduced I said, "Before this Congress adjourns I am going to introduce a bill to repeal that provision, and we are going to repeal it, either in this Congress or in the next one. That provision must come out, Senators, or men who fight its coming out will soon get out of here. Anybody who will defend that provision which brought so much distress and suffering to millions of American people ought not to be commissioned by any State to have a seat in this great law-making body."

You see, Mr. President, how closely the line is drawn here to-day. Here is an opportunity to serve the masses of the people. Here is an opportunity to protect legitimate business in this country from those who would prey upon it. Here is an opportunity to uproot a provision out of which has come more misery than any provision ever put into a law since I have been a Member of Congress.

What is the purpose of this rule which has been called to my attention by my friend the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], about the reference of a bill or resolution, suggesting that if any question is raised about where a bill shall go the Senate itself shall determine where it shall go? I remember that in my service in the House years ago it was openly charged by Republican newspapers that a certain Speaker of the House would refer bills to committees where he knew they would never be reported out; that he appointed these committees; that the members of them were dependent upon him for the favor of occupying places upon the committees; and that when he referred a bill to a particular committee and indicated that he did not want it reported out the bill went into its long, last sleep. There was a good deal of truth in it, too. Now, here is a situation arising where we want action on a bill. We suggest that we want it referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Were my suspicions well founded? I thought the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. McLEAN] would be hostile to it. He appears to be hostile to it. The Senator from Mississippi asked him if he would not consent to have instructions placed about it so that that committee would report it back in five days—he did not say "favorably," but report it out, so that it could be on the calendar and we could decide what we would do with it—and the Senator shuts himself up in the secret councils of his own mind and says no; he is not willing to have that done.

Mr. President, you can not explain to the people of the country that you did not want to offend the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee. You can not explain to the people of the country that you thought that under the rules of the Senate in all probability it was best to refer it to that committee because the chairman asked that it be done. You can not explain to the people who were robbed under deflation growing out of this amendment that you did not want to offend some member of the Banking and Currency Committee, and that that is why you voted to refer it to that committee.

They will ask you, "Did not deflation injure me?"

"Yes."

"Did it not injure millions of others?"

"Yes."

"Did they not, then, charge a little bank 15 or 20 per cent?"

"Yes."

"And some of them more than that?"

"Yes."

"And one bank in Alabama 87½ per cent under that provision?"

"Yes."

"And were not HEFLIN and others trying to get it out of the law?"

"Yes."

"And did not HEFLIN move that it be referred to a committee that he knew was friendly to it?"

"Yes."

"Was not that the best and quickest way to get it out?"

"I think it was."

"Were not the chairman and some other members of the Banking and Currency Committee hostile to it?"

"I think so."

"Yet you voted to refer it to that committee, did you not?"

"Yes."

"And now you ask me to vote to send you back where you can vote to do what the chairman of one of those committees asks you to do rather than do that which will benefit me and other people like situated as I am."

That is the situation Senators will have to answer. I will print in a few days in the Record two letters which John Skelton Williams wrote to the Senator from Connecticut several months ago about that report of 1920, which will throw some light upon the subject.

All I want is action on this thing. Congress will adjourn on the 4th of March, and we are nearly out of the month of January. We have but little more than a month now, and I want to get the bill passed through this body this week, get it over to the House, get it through the House and enacted into the law.

I ask the Senator from Connecticut now if he would be willing to report it out in six days if I should consent to have it go to his committee?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LENROOT in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. McLEAN. If the bill is to be accompanied with instructions to the Committee on Banking and Currency to report it out, its only purpose would be to get it before the Senate. It is on the table now, or will be if the motion of the Senator from Alabama fails and it is not referred to any committee. The Senator knows that he can offer it as an amendment to the pending bill, the Lenroot bill. There is no difficulty in the way of the Senator getting a vote upon this proposition, and at no time have I expressed my approval or disapproval of this particular provision of the act.

It was, as I said, introduced by me at the urgent request of the Federal Reserve Board, and I felt that it was my duty to give that request serious consideration. As to the merits of this particular provision, the Senator ought to know that its failures or its benefits will depend entirely upon its administration, as in the case of any other law. If it had been administered, as the Senator said, in response to the views of Comptroller Williams, it would have done no harm; but it was not so administered, and in his opinion it did great harm. It is a question of administration. The provision is merely a gun behind the door. It may be used wisely, it may not; it depends entirely upon the man who administers it. I think the Senator will find the same rule will apply to almost any provision of the act. The Senator can offer his bill as an amendment to the pending bill, the Lenroot bill, and he can get a vote on it then. I have expressed no opinion as to whether or not I would vote for or against it. My only object is to protect the legitimate procedure of this body.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the Senator help me to have it passed if I offer it as an amendment to the Lenroot bill?

Mr. McLEAN. I think the Senator himself will agree that I ought to have an opportunity to consider it, and I think that the Senate ought to carefully consider this provision. I am not ready this morning to pass on that question. I am willing to say to the Senator that I am not confirmed in my judgment that it is of any great permanent benefit.

Mr. HEFLIN. That provision of the law?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes. I felt so at the time it was presented to me by a member of the Federal Reserve Board, but under the circumstances it seemed to me to be my duty as a Republican to support it. I assumed that it would be wisely administered. That is the view I took of it at the time. My only point now is that I think the Senate ought to go on record with regard to this motion. I want to know whether any Senator is to have the right to refer a bill to any committee he chooses, without regard to the subject matter. That is the question before the Senate now.

Mr. HEFLIN. Suppose I offer it to-day as an amendment to the Lenroot farm credits bill; will the Senator oppose its enactment?

Mr. McLEAN. If the Senator offers it as an amendment, I suppose it will be in order.

Mr. HEFLIN. So far as the Senator is concerned, he would not undertake to make any point of order against it?

Mr. McLEAN. The only thing I could do would be to raise a point of order, and I can not conceive that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. HEFLIN. And the Senator would not make any point of order?

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator from Wisconsin is in charge of the pending bill, and how he would feel about it I do not know. I shall make no point of order.

Mr. HEFLIN. That would expedite matters some. With that understanding with the Senator from Connecticut, I withdraw my motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Agriculture, and give notice that I will offer it as an amendment to the Lenroot bill.

Mr. McLEAN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. McLEAN. Can the Senator withdraw his motion?

Mr. HEFLIN. I said that with that understanding, I would withdraw my motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator from Wisconsin is now in the chair. He has charge of his bill, and some other Senator might make a point of order. I want a vote on this proposition.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not think it is subject to a point of order, anyway.

Mr. McLEAN. I think the Senate ought to go on record, and I object to any withdrawal of the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. My purpose was to have it sanctioned by some committee and have a favorable report made on it, and pass it independently of any other bill; or we can put it on the pending bill as an amendment, as the Senator from Connecticut suggests. What I want is to have it enacted into law.

Mr. McLEAN. If the Senator withdraws his motion, I shall renew it and move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ask for a vote. I do not want it referred to the Committee on Agriculture. I prefer that it lie on the table if the Senator from Alabama wants an opportunity to bring it up. I can not make any promise as to what the Committee on Banking and Currency would do with it.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Senator does not make any motion and I withdraw mine, we can just let it lie on the table for the present, can we not?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama withdraw his motion?

Mr. POMERENE. I thought the Senator from Alabama had yielded the floor, and I was going to make a few observations on this subject myself.

Mr. HEFLIN. I said that in view of the statement made by the Senator from Connecticut that he would not make any point of order against the bill, I would withdraw my motion to refer it to the Committee on Agriculture, with the understanding that I would offer it as an amendment to the Lenroot bill, and with the further suggestion from him that it lie on the table, that it just remain on the Vice President's table, so that I could offer it as an amendment to the pending bill.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, the Senator need not offer this bill as an amendment. He can draw a new one and offer it as an amendment to the Lenroot bill. It makes no difference whether this is referred to a committee or not.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LODGE. I will wait until the Senator gets through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama withdraw his motion?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do, with that understanding, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair can not attach any condition. Does the Senator withdraw his motion or not?

Mr. HEFLIN. Well, then, I will leave it pending for the present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have no desire to discuss the merits of the amendment, or bill, or whatever it is; but I think the question of the settlement of the proper jurisdiction of committees of the Senate is very important. If we are not to observe the ordinary jurisdiction of the different committees, the whole organization of the Senate will drop to pieces. I think the Senate ought to decide where this bill shall go. That will not prevent it from being offered as an amendment to the pending bill, if any Senator sees fit to do it. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Massachusetts can not make that motion under the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama is correct. While the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Agriculture is pending a motion to refer it to another committee is not in order.

Mr. LODGE. Not while the other motion is pending. If the other motion is pending, I simply ask for a vote on it. That is perfectly satisfactory to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Alabama that the bill be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency and have been since its organization. I think no committee in the Senate has been more diligent in attending to the business committed to it than the Banking and Currency Committee. No other committee has to its credit better legislation than the Banking and Currency Committee. I need only refer to the reserve act, to the farm loan act, to the Copper bill, and to the Lenroot bill which is now pending before the Senate.

I remember very distinctly when the question came up as to whether or not we should adopt a graduated rate of discount. At that time I think I supported it but I was not friendly to it because I felt that under the original act we had lodged plenary power in the Federal Reserve Board to fix the rate of discount and I felt at that time if any member bank got to a point where it was making unusual demands it was within the power of the Federal Reserve Board to deny them.

It seems excessive rates of discount have been charged—just what I anticipated. The Federal Reserve Board was not responsible for them; the local reserve banks were. Aye, more than that, the member banks were directly responsible for any abuse that the system has suffered or the communities have suffered.

I have heard a number of references to the particular bank in which on one loan 87½ per cent was charged. That was an outrage. I think the Federal reserve bank made a mistake when it allowed that discount. I think the member bank made a mistake when it made the application for it. But there was another mistake made, if I am rightly informed, and that mistake was made by the Comptroller of the Currency when he did not appoint a receiver for that bank and take away its charter. If I am rightly informed, the bank got to making loans to companies in which members of the bank were particularly interested, and many of those loans bore the indorsement of the president of the bank.

Mr. GLASS. I may say to the Senator that 90 per cent of the capital of the bank was loaned upon indorsements of the president.

Mr. POMERENE. I am obliged to the Senator from Virginia for giving us that information. It simply demonstrates that I was right when I made the statement that the Comptroller of the Currency ought to have closed the bank and taken its charter. The difficulty as to most of the loans has been with the member banks. The fact of the matter is that many of the banks which are now making complaints loaned excessively to men who were gambling in one commodity or another, with the result that they were not able to accommodate the smaller borrowers in their respective communities.

Now, Mr. President, I think that if I were called upon to-day to vote upon the merits of the proposition of the Senator from Alabama I should vote for it, but I would feel very much better satisfied if I could have the views of the Federal Reserve Board on the subject; not that they would be controlling, but necessarily they would be more or less persuasive.

If any fault lies with anybody because the statute has been permitted to remain upon the statute books so long a time, I fear that my good friend from Alabama must share that responsibility. We have had a good many speeches made upon the subject, and I am in sympathy with the complaints which were made against some of the abuses, but I note that the bill was only introduced on the 27th of January, 1923, and to-day is the 29th. It has not even been referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and the distinguished Senator from Alabama seeks to offend every member of the Banking and Currency Committee by asking that the bill go to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, which has no jurisdiction whatever of it. Agriculture may be interested in the subject, but agriculture is no more interested in it than is the laboring man, the manufacturer, or the merchant of the country; in other words, it is essentially a banking and currency bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to ask the Senator a question. I shall read what happened in two of the banking districts. I shall ask the Senator the question then how, if we repeal the provision, such abuses as grew up at that time could be prevented. I know of no other way unless the Federal Reserve Board close down and say "You can not have any money whatever," and thus punish all the banks in the district.

For instance, in January, 1920, 14 banks of Kansas City had absorbed 24 per cent of the normal lending power of the Federal reserve bank and 9 Omaha banks had absorbed 35 per cent. Therefore, those two cities alone had absorbed 57 per cent of the normal lending power of the Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank. There was a slight recession of the borrowings of those banks due to the temporary season of deflation in the early part of 1920, but by April, 1920, the 14 Kansas City banks were absorbing 50 per cent of the normal lending power of the Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank and 9 Omaha banks were absorbing 23 per cent, representing a total of 73 per cent of the normal lending power of the Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank, and leaving only 27 per cent of the normal lending power of that bank available for the 1,063 other member banks of the Kansas City district.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I inquire whether the pending motion is debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, it is.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I refer the Chair to the concluding paragraph of Rule VIII, on page 14:

All motions made before 2 o'clock to proceed to the consideration of any matter shall be determined without debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would remind the Senator that such a motion as the one pending is not a motion to proceed to the consideration of any matter. It was so ruled by Vice President Marshall.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then a motion to refer is debatable without limit at any time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those are the previous rulings, and, of course, the motion is debatable unless some specific provision of the rule cuts off debate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Some of us want to get to the calendar in due course.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President—

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the present occupant of the chair is a clear and fair parliamentarian, but I think he must have overlooked Rule VII. It can not be debatable under any hypothesis except by allowing each Senator five minutes. Has the Presiding Officer read that provision of the rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But this is not on a call of the calendar.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator from Ohio will yield further to me, this is Calendar Monday. The most scrupulous good faith should exist in reaching the calendar on the day set apart for its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But morning business has not yet been closed.

Mr. ASHURST. If Senators may speak at any length during the morning hour, then Calendar Monday is dissipated and exhausted.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator please advise whether I have spoken five minutes?

Mr. ASHURST. I am interested in the Senator's speech. If he were to speak an hour, it would only seem like five minutes to me.

Mr. POMERENE. I thank the Senator. I assure the Senator I shall not offend even so good a friend as he.

Mr. ASHURST. I am so completely disarmed that I shall sit down.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I precipitated the inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining whether the rules of the Senate are such that a Senator can get in the very first thing after the roll call in the morning and move to refer some matter to a committee and then exhaust the entire morning hour in discussing the subject. I hope our rules are not so defective.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Montana that we are still proceeding under morning business. We are still under the order of the introduction and reference of bills and joint resolutions. It has been repeatedly held that a motion to refer a bill is debatable. Of course, it is debatable, unless some provision of the rules can be found cutting off debate, and there is no such provision.

Mr. LODGE. I think the Chair is entirely right, but there is great force in what the Senator from Montana said. There is one way in which debate can be cut off, and that is to move that the motion to refer be laid upon the table. In order to end the debate—though I do not wish to take the Senator from Ohio off the floor—

Mr. POMERENE. I am quite ready to take my seat, except that the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] asked me a question and I was going to answer it. However, I yield for the purpose of the motion.

Mr. LODGE. I want to clear the way for the calendar, and if there is no other motion interposed, I shall move to lay the motion made by the Senator from Alabama on the table.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will defer the motion. In fact, I hope he will not make the motion at all.

Mr. LODGE. I have no desire to do so, I assure the Senator.

Mr. GLASS. I think we should decide here and now whether the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate should be disbanded and whether it is to be discredited every time a Senator suspects that it may not do just exactly what he desires that it should do and just exactly at the time when he desires to have it done. I think we ought to decide that question.

Mr. LODGE. I am very anxious to reach that decision, but under the rules apparently there is no way to reach it except by the motion I have suggested. I am perfectly willing to withhold the motion if I can find out what is to become of the motion to refer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Further answering the parliamentary inquiry of the Senator from Montana, the Chair would call the attention of the Senator from Montana to paragraph 3 of Rule XIV, which provides that—

Bills and joint resolutions introduced on leave and bills and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives shall be read once and may be read twice on the same day, if not objected to, for reference, but shall not be considered on that day as in Committee of the Whole nor debated, except for reference, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That, I understand, refers to the day upon which a bill is introduced. It may be read twice on the day on which it is introduced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Nor debated, except for reference.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; but all having reference to the day on which it is introduced.

Bills and joint resolutions introduced on leave and bills and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives shall be read once and may be read twice on the same day—

That means the day on which it is introduced—

If not objected to, for reference, but shall not be considered on that day as in Committee of the Whole nor debated—

That is, debated on that day—except for reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to lay the motion of the Senator from Alabama on the table.

Mr. LODGE. I withdrew that motion at the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I have no desire to cut off debate, but I wish a direct vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. I withdraw my motion for the present.

Mr. LODGE. A motion can not be withdrawn "for the present." It is either withdrawn or not withdrawn.

Mr. HEFLIN. I withdraw it; and if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] wants to move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, I shall ask the Senate to instruct that committee to report it out one way or the other within five days.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama withdraws his motion to refer Senate bill 4427 to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Without objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency in accordance with the rule.

Mr. HEFLIN. I move that the Committee on Banking and Currency be instructed to report the bill out within five days.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Committee on Banking and Currency be instructed to report the bill referred to it back to the Senate within five days. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I regret very much that the distinguished Senator from Alabama decided to withdraw his motion, because I think the Senate ought to be permitted to decide to-day whether or not it has any further use for the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, and whether it proposes continually to discredit that committee and to affront its members by totally irregular references of bills to other committees which have no jurisdiction of the subject involved.

The discussion of the merits of the particular amendment to the Federal reserve act which has been proposed by the Senator from Alabama is largely academic, for the reason, Mr. President, that the progressive rate authorized by the act was suspended more than two years ago. As a matter of fact, the progressive rate in the Atlanta district, in which the Senator from Alabama resides, was suspended before the Senator became a Member of this body. As I recall, he was sworn in as a Member of the Senate on the 6th day of December, 1920, and the progressive rate in the Atlanta district was discontinued in November, 1920, about a month before the Senator became a Member of this body.

Not only that, but anybody who takes the trouble to refer to the report of the Joint Commission on Agricultural Inquiry will there see, in the testimony of the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, the statement that the board itself had come to the conclusion that the progressive rate, operating so differently from what was anticipated, was a rather crude and, at times, unjust method of dealing with the problem, and that he was authorized by the board to say that there was not the slightest probability of the progressive rate being again applied in the administration of the Federal reserve banking system.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. I should like to ask the Senator a question. If it is admitted that it is unwise to exercise that power, why would it not be wise to take away from a legislative agent the power to do a thing that would be unwise if it were done?

Mr. GLASS. It would; and I think it was unwise to invest these banks with that specific power in the first place.

Mr. CARAWAY. And, therefore, it would be wise to repeal the law?

Mr. GLASS. I think so; and I am prepared right now for the immediate consideration of the proposition to repeal it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought that was the Senator's attitude.

Mr. GLASS. But my remarks refer to the suggestion that there is some imminent danger from this suspended power of the board. The progressive rate was suspended more than two years ago; it has not been applied since and is not likely ever again to be applied. So far as I am concerned, I should like to see it wiped from the statute books, but I want it done in an orderly way; moreover, I want to be fair. I am a partisan when I go out on the stump and arraign my political adversaries; but here, under my oath, I think there is an obligation to be temperate and scrupulously accurate. I should like to remind the distinguished Senator from Alabama, who is usually so exact about these matters, that it is not precisely just to say, for example, that Mr. Platt was a Republican member of the Federal Reserve Board when this alteration of the law was made. Mr. Platt was then a Republican Member of the House of Representatives. The Senator from Alabama likewise is altogether inaccurate in saying that Mr. Mitchell, another Republican, was a member of the Federal Reserve Board at the time. Mr. Mitchell did not become a member of the Federal Reserve Board for many months after this amendment was suggested to and adopted by the Congress. It was not a Republican proposition; it was not a Democratic proposition. As a matter of fact, the most insistent advocates of the amendment in the other branch of Congress were three Democratic Members of the House. It was advocated by Mr. STEVENSON, of South Carolina, as clear-headed a lawyer as ever came to either branch of the Congress of the United States; it was advocated by Mr. WINGO, of Arkansas, a man with one of the acutest minds of all the men I have even encountered since I have been in Congress; it was advocated by Mr. Phelan, a distinguished Democrat of Massachusetts, who once was the Democratic chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House of Representatives. All of them favored the amendment of the act as distinctly in the interest of the farming community.

As to the suggestion that the progressive rate brought about deflation, anybody who will take pains to examine the report of the joint commission appointed to investigate agricultural problems will see it stated there that the application of the progressive rate in no single regional reserve district put any limitation upon the volume of loans made. It brought about a better distribution of rediscounts. That report points out that in the Kansas City district, where the rate was more regularly and longest applied, loans increased, and that 326 banks, which prior to the application of that rate had made no rediscounts whatsoever with the Federal reserve bank, began to borrow money to accommodate the farmers in that district. It created no deflation; it did not even put any limitation upon, it did not circumscribe to the extent of one dollar the total borrowings of the banks in any one of these districts; on the contrary, it expanded loans, because it enabled the country banks outside and away from Kansas City and Omaha and the larger cities to get their just proportion of the rediscounts of the Federal reserve banks.

It has been suggested that the progressive rates were applied only in the agricultural districts of the country. Mr. President, it ought to be stated in fairness that the progressive rates were applied only where they were asked for; in other words, the Federal Reserve Board at Washington does not initiate interest rates. Every rediscount rate is initiated in the regional reserve bank itself, and reviewed and approved, or rejected, as the case may be, by the Federal Reserve Board at Washington. So the talk about the Federal Reserve Board applying this rate only in the agricultural districts is simply misleading. It was applied in those Federal reserve districts which asked for it, and no others. There were but four applying districts—Atlanta, Dallas, Kansas City, and St. Louis. The Federal reserve bank at Chicago, which, I venture to say, caters to the agricultural industry in the ratio of 3 to 1, compared with the Federal reserve bank in Atlanta or Dallas, did not ask the rate to be put into effect there. The Federal reserve bank at Minneapolis, ministering to the great grain-growing interests of the Northwest, did not ask to have the rate put into effect there. The Federal reserve bank at San Francisco, serving the great agricultural interest of the Pacific coast, particularly the fruit-growing interests, did not ask the rate put into effect there. Hence it is not exactly fair, Mr. President, to represent to the country that the central Federal Reserve Board at Washington, in conspiracy to destroy the agricultural interests of the country and thereby to destroy the country itself, maliciously and deliberately forced this progressive rate upon the agricultural districts of the country only.

This much I wanted to say briefly. It is my purpose a little later on in the present session of Congress, when we are not occupied with much more important questions than academic discussions of this sort, to have something to say, perhaps at length, about the administration of the Federal reserve banking system; but this much I wanted to say upon the pending proposition.

I repeat my regret that the distinguished Senator from Alabama has withdrawn his motion, because I think it is time for the members of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate to understand whether they are under suspicion or whether they are to be perpetually offended here by having measures which properly come under their jurisdiction referred to some committee that has nothing whatsoever to do with the merits of the proposition advanced.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] made reference to a single instance where a high interest rate was charged. I want the RECORD to show that I called attention here on Saturday to 227 instances, to 227 banks. That many were found in the report sent here by the Federal Reserve Board by a casual examination.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think the Senator has unintentionally misstated my position. I referred to the very high rate that the Senator spoke of, namely, 87½ per cent.

Mr. HEFLIN. I got the impression that the Senator thought there were only one or two instances, and that he did not hear my remarks Saturday.

Mr. POMERENE. There was only one instance in which that high rate was charged.

Mr. HEFLIN. But there were a number of instances where 15 and 18 and 21 per cent and higher was charged.

Mr. POMERENE. I think the Senator is correct about that, and I think those rates are too high; but I think we would remedy this situation very much more quickly and very much more effectively if we would direct some of our efforts toward the legislatures of the several States, and get them to reduce their rates of interest where the banks in those States have been making these charges to their customers.

Mr. HEFLIN. There is a legal rate of interest in my State of 8 per cent; in some of the States the rate is 6 per cent, in some 7 per cent, and so on; but this progressive interest rate was applied by the regional bank under the direction and sanction of the Federal Reserve Board, with Governor Harding at its head, and these people were robbed under it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Of course, I think the Senator is mistaken in the assumption that the rates were applied under the direction of the Federal Reserve Board. The testimony of the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board before the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry was that he did not know these rates had been applied until after they had been rescinded—that is, until after November, 1920.

If the Senator will permit a moment, however, responding to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio about the outrageous nature of these particular rates, I agree that the progressive rate never should have been applied. I think a minimum flat rate and a maximum flat rate should have been applied, instead of a progressive rate; but with respect to this particular bank, where the rates on perhaps an inappreciable part of the volume of loans of that bank reached 87½ per cent, these are the facts: The law required that this bank keep a reserve, as I recall, of $9,600 with its Federal reserve bank as a basis for the loans that it might want to make. The bank, instead of keeping $9,600—I may not be precise as to the figures—at the Atlanta bank, kept $96 reserve; and it was because of this perpetual violation of the law, because for 11 out of 12 months of the year its reserve practically disappeared, that it was penalized to the extent that it was penalized. I desire, however, to call attention to this significant fact: The official report presented in this Chamber on day before yesterday showed that the average rate of interest on the total borrowings of that bank at the Atlanta Federal Reserve Bank did not exceed 8.05 per cent.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, this bank in my State was mistreated and beat to its knees, and there was no occasion for it. This bank survived even that 87½ per cent, which shows any fair-minded man that the application of that high, usurious, oppressive, and prohibitive rate was inexcusable and indefensible. There are hundreds of instances where they charged 15, 18, 20, 21 per cent, and even higher percentages, and all during that time they were charging in New York City, the gamblers of Wall Street 5 per cent, and never over 6 per cent.

I am fighting for a fair deal for the people of the United States. I ought not to be afraid to say what I think about the reprehensible and criminal conduct of those who conspired together to produce deflation. They are the enemies of my country. They did more in two years to produce Bolshevism and encourage socialism and anarchy than any other force in the Government has ever done. Those who desire to defend them, of course, are at liberty to do so. Let their constituents take notice; and I want to suggest to any Democrat who might be inclined to do such a thing that he had better let the Republicans defend their murderous deflation policy. I make that suggestion for what it is worth. My friend from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] says that "it is all right to get out on the stump and hurrah at this, that, and the other, but here, under our oaths, we ought to be very careful." Well, Mr. President, I fought these evils on the stump out on the hustings; I fight them here in this Chamber as best I can. There are Senators who only fight them on the hustings, and when we get here—ah—

As bees on flowers alighting cease their hum,
Some Senators elected soon grow dumb.

[Laughter.]

I have saddled the responsibility for this deflation where it belongs, upon Republican leaders and upon one who was on that board at the head of it, and who betrayed his party and became a Republican and supported the Republican ticket, according to the Washington Times. I have read from it time after time, and he has never denied it. He told Hon. Lee Long, of my State, a distinguished Democrat, and now a member of the Legislature of Alabama, that nationally he was a Republican.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] in his defense of this deadly deflation—and I want to say that this is not the first time the Senator has defended it, and it probably will not be the last time—

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GLASS. Of course, the Senator knows perfectly well that I have not defended any deflation. I have asserted and proved by authentic official figures that for the period of falling prices, from January 1, 1920, to January 1, 1921, there was no deflation but expansion.

Mr. HEFLIN. That was not the end of the deflation period. The end of deflation was not reached until several months had elapsed in 1921. During that period of deflation the currency was contracted to the extent of more than $1,000,000,000.

Mr. GLASS. That was the period that I discussed, Mr. President, and therefore the Senator has no right to identify me with any other period in anything that I have said.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator is defending the proposition.

Mr. GLASS. Defending what proposition?

Mr. HEFLIN. I said the progressive interest rate was applied only in the agricultural sections.

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. And the Senator says it was applied nowhere except where it was asked for, intimating that the board had nothing to do with it.

Mr. GLASS. Well, does the Senator deny that proposition?

Mr. HEFLIN. Of course I do. I assert that Governor Welborn, of the Atlanta bank, came to Washington and went before the board on August 31, 1921, and asked that that bank be excused from this progressive interest rate, and that Governor Harding declined to let it be done. His visit here for that purpose is shown in the correspondence between Governor Welborn and John Skelton Williams. I printed it in the RECORD in July, 1922.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption, I do not undertake to say what happened. I only know what the record shows and what the Federal Reserve Board says; and the Federal Reserve Board says and the record of the testimony before the joint commission shows that Governor Welborn did not come to Washington and ask for anything of the sort. Governor Welborn informally inquired, if the Atlanta bank should make the request, how the board would view it; and later the board proposed to discontinue the rate in the Atlanta district and put the interest rate on a flat 7 per cent basis, and the record shows that there were some members of the board who voted against that proposition, but not the governor of the board.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I assert that Governor Welborn wrote a letter to John Skelton Williams in which he himself asserted that he had appeared before that board and asked to be excused from applying that progressive interest rate. It is in that correspondence. I stand on Governor Welborn's letter upon that subject. Governor Harding did not want to excuse that bank, and that provision was applied to banks in my State—a little national bank in north Alabama among the number. The president of that bank told me that they charged him 9 per cent to get money to supply his customers, and, of course, he had to charge something above that in order to take care of his business; and while that was being done Wall Street speculators and bond sharks were getting every dollar they needed at 5 per cent and 6 per cent.

I come back to my proposition. I assert again, and I challenge any Member of this body to disprove the assertion, that the progressive interest rate was not applied anywhere excepting in the district of the Atlanta bank, the Dallas bank, the Kansas City bank, and the St. Louis bank.

Mr. GLASS. Will the Senator say whether any other bank asked to have it applied? Those four banks initiated the rate.

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, I do not know. I have nothing to do with that. It is immaterial here.

Mr. GLASS. But the Senator wants to be fair—

Mr. HEFLIN. I am going to be fair.

Mr. GLASS. And the Senator knows that under the law and under the policy of the system the Federal Reserve Board does not initiate rates. The regional reserve bank initiates rates. The Federal Reserve Board simply approves or disapproves.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Federal Reserve Board can suggest what ought to be done; and I submit that in the instance at Atlanta it seems that that was done, because Governor Welborn came up early in the game and asked that its cruel operation be taken off of his people, and the board would not let them do it. It does not make any difference who initiated it. If the bank initiated it and tried it out and then saw that it was hard on our people, destructive to their business, and wanted to get rid of it, and the board would not permit that to be done, the responsibility comes back to the board. That is my contention.

I have asserted heretofore, and I assert again, that nowhere in the East was that rate applied; nowhere in the North was it applied. It was applied nowhere except in the agricultural sections that I have mentioned.

Why was that done? I do not care whether any local bank intimidated by Governor Harding asked for it or not; if the Federal Reserve Board had been just and fair, it would not have permitted the rate to be applied to any section of the country. That is my position on that.

The Senator from Virginia comes now with his defense of the Federal Reserve Board. The Federal Reserve Board operated in such a way as to permit the bond sharks of New York to buy up bonds all over the South and West at $85, $82.50, and $80 on the hundred, and they made about $200,000,000 in the South in buying these bonds, and they bought them in the West along the same lines and made millions and hundreds of millions out of the cotton of the South in 1920. They made it out of grain, they made it out of cattle, and the people of the South and West were robbed. The board had the power to stop the operation of such a process, and the board did not do it. The board had the power to say to them, "You have got to give to legitimate business at least as small a rate as you give to the gamblers of Wall Street," but the board did not do it. The board had the right to say to them, "You have to accept these gilt-edged Liberty bonds, gold bonds, as security at the bank for loans of money to farmers trying to keep their produce from being sold below the cost of production," but the board did not do it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. In a moment. The board had the right to say to those who were robbing the cattlemen of the West, "You shall not sacrifice the cattle industry upon the altar of greed," but the board did not do it. Now, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GLASS. Surely the Senator knows perfectly well that so far from rejecting Liberty bonds as the basis of loans, the Federal Reserve Board differentiated in favor of Liberty bonds, and that whereas 6 and 7 per cent was charged on commercial discounts, a rate of 4 $\frac{1}{2}$, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$, and 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ was charged on loans with Liberty bonds as a basis.

Mr. HEFLIN. The point I am making is that they did not loan money on bonds.

Mr. GLASS. The advantage was altogether in favor of the bonds, and yet the Senator arraigns the Federal Reserve Board for refusing to make loans on bonds, whereas they made loans on Liberty bonds at a preferential rate.

Mr. HEFLIN. I stand on the position that they did not make such loans in any appreciable amount. They made a handful, of course, to those who were their pets, those who were hugged to their bosom, those who shared the tips that were sent out in connection with this awful drive and collapse in prices. If any were able to borrow money in the agricultural sections on Liberty bonds, there were very few of them. I have not heard of a single farmer who did. I am talking about the hundreds and thousands who went to the banks and said as a last resort, "I will bring the Government bonds that I bought and stunted myself to buy and borrow on them." The local banker said, "We would like to accommodate you, but the Federal Reserve Board will not permit us to do it."

I rode on a train with a banker of Georgia who had been up to New York to the great American bankers' convention, where W. P. G. Harding's friends tried to get them to indorse him for governor of the Federal Reserve Board, and they would not do it. I got acquainted with him, and he said, "I indorse the fight you have been making on deflation. I want to tell you what happened to me. I had $18,000 worth of bonds, and I went to Atlanta and told them I wanted to get some money on them to take care of my customers, and they told me I could not get it. They said, 'Go sell your bonds.' I was forced to do so, and I lost $2,200 on the deal." Such as that is what happened among bankers in the South and West.

I know of a man in Eufaula, Ala., who tried to borrow a hundred dollars with a thousand-dollar bond as security and failed. Congressman Dent, who used to represent the capital district of my State, is my authority for that.

There are hundreds and thousands of instances where loans on Liberty bonds were refused. Fixing a rate for loans on bonds is one thing and actually making the loan is quite another. They did not make them in the agricultural sections.

Oh, Mr. President, the truth is they denied accommodations to the man and the woman who had Liberty bonds who were willing to put them up as collateral in order to hold back their produce from the ravenous wolves of Wall Street who were forcing them to sell and devouring their substance. The order from the Federal Reserve Board would not let the banks loan on those bonds. Then what happened? The owners were forced to sell them. Who bought them? The Wall Street bond sharks bought them at $85 on the hundred, at $82.50, and some of them at as low as $80 on the hundred. Just think of that, Senators.

The Senator from Virginia had better consult some other authority. He says, "The Federal Reserve Board said this" and "The Federal Reserve Board said that." Do you expect me to accept the statement of Governor Harding on anything pertaining to deflation? I will not do it. I have contradicted him with his own statements and impeached him a dozen times on this floor. Did he not tell the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] that if he could get that progressive interest rate it never would be applied in agricultural sections? He did. Did he not tell him that he wanted it so he could apply it in New York City? He did. After he got it, did he apply it in New York? He did not. Did he apply it in the agricultural sections? He did. Did the governor of one of those banks, Governor Welborn, come and ask to be excused from it? He did. Did Governor Harding grant his request? He did not. That is the record of this man, the head of that board at that time, and this is not the first time the Senator from Virginia has come to the board's defense and to his defense.

The crime of '73 pales into insignificance when compared with the deflation crime of 1920, the crime I am discussing to-day. I am trying to get that provision as to the progressive rediscount rate out of the law.

Mr. President, I have dotted with red pencil the little banks scattered through the South and West, just a few of them, where this progressive interest rate was applied—11 per cent, 12 per cent, 13 per cent, 14 per cent, 15 per cent, 16 per cent, 17 per cent, 18 per cent, and on up to 87 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent—as these little banks were pressed, as the farmers came in saying, "We are your customers. Here is our cotton. It is going down, down, down. It is now below the cost of production. Won't you help us?" The banker would say, "I will; my credit is good and my bank is sound," and he was borrowing money to help people whose business was being destroyed, but the Federal reserve bank said to him, "If you get more money to supply those people you will have to pay, under the progressive interest rate, 15, 20, 30, 40, 50, 60, 87½ per cent." They made him do it, and that did not even break the little bank in my State. There never was such an atrocious crime under the sun. If the bank had failed, they might have said, "That shows it was in bad condition"; but the bank did not fail even with that millstone tied around its neck, and after Governor Harding knocking it in the head with a maul. It even survived that.

So, Mr. President, I fight here in the Senate for what I believe is right, and the things that I condemn here I condemn on the stump. I do not arraign the Republican Party on the hustings in any way that I will not arraign it here. This is the place to fight. This is the place to determine the bent of men's minds on great questions. This is the place to locate their leanings when the issue is clearly presented. This is the place to find out where their sympathies are. This is the place to find out whether the center of gravity in their nature is on the side of the people or on the side of the special interests. Men may seek to disguise it, but here we come to know them, for the Bible tells us that "by their fruits ye shall know them."

Mr. President, I want to close with this thought in the minds of Senators. I assert again that the Federal Reserve Board did not direct that the progressive interest rate be applied, did not permit it to be applied, anywhere except in the agricultural sections of the South and West.

I charge again that by the application of it there and by the refusal to make loans on cotton and grain and cattle there they slaughtered property values by the billion; they caused men to lose their homes; they caused their farms to be swept away under mortgage foreclosures; they drove women into the madhouses and their husbands to death with bullets through their brains. That is the crime I lay at the door of deflationists and those who defend them.

I am no respecter of persons when it comes to that, Mr. President. The United States must know, from center to circumference, that this crime was inspired, that a conspiracy was back of it; must know how it operated; must know who brought it about; must know exactly how it was done, so that public opinion, rising out of every nook and corner in this Republic, will come so strong that this national crime will never be committed again.

Oh, my God, if we can fix the law so that the Federal Reserve Board—I do not care whether composed of Democrats or Republicans—will not have the power to murder business and send some men and women to the insane asylums and others into their graves. I want to see to it, and I am going to fight until we put an amendment into the law, I do not care how many Republican defenders may appear to defend or even if one lone Democrat comes to the rescue when Republican deflation is assailed. I want some Republican, like the Senator from Connecticut, who introduced that provision himself and had it put into the law, to defend Republican deflation, born under the leadership of Republicans out of Wall Street connections, carried out by Governor Harding, a Republican, promised in the Republican platform of 1920, promised in the President's acceptance speech, applied ruthlessly and mercilessly while the Republican Congress sat in control at the Capitol, and never a protesting voice raised by a single Republican leader against it. That is the record. Let the record speak for itself.

Oh, Mr. President, those are the facts as I have submitted them. I now ask for a vote on the motion which was made by the Senator from Connecticut to refer this bill to the Banking and Currency Committee, with my amendment instructing them to report the bill back to the Senate in five days.

Mr. LODGE. We are entitled to a separate vote on the instruction in the nature of an amendment. I shall ask for a separate vote.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I do not propose to delay matters 30 seconds. I dislike to break in rudely upon this vehement flood tide of eloquence, but I simply want to call attention in a word to a fact which answers it all.

The State of Alabama is within the jurisdiction of the Federal reserve bank at Atlanta, and in the official data, Appendix A, presented in the Senate on Saturday last, it will be noted that member bank collateral notes secured by Liberty bonds or Victory notes actually owned by the borrowing bank on April 1, 1920, or by Treasury certificates actually owned, were subject to only normal discount rates.

It will be further seen that on June 14, 1920, after approval by the Federal Reserve Board, the Atlanta Federal reserve bank made an order that paper drawn for strictly agricultural production, up to 100 per cent of the member banks' capital and surplus, was excepted entirely from the application of the progressive rate.

Mr. HEFLIN. The point I am making is that they did not make the loans. I do not care what kind of an order their records may now show that they issued then. My contention is that they would not loan on Liberty bonds and that they quit loaning on cotton and called loans to the great hurt and injury of the cotton farmers.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I dislike to continue this discussion, but the statement of the Senator from Alabama is utterly unwarranted by the facts.

When I discussed the resolution I called attention to the fact that at the time the act amending section 14 was passed it was passed at the request of the Federal Reserve Board, which was composed of Democrats. The Senator denied it and insisted that Mr. Platt, of New York, was a member of the board and that Mr. Miller, a member of the board, were Republicans. Mr. Platt was a Member of Congress at the time and the other gentleman, Mr. Miller, everybody knows was a Wilson Republican of the deepest dye.

Mr. HEFLIN. A Wilson Republican? A Wilson Republican may show signs of a change of heart, but he is still a Republican.

Mr. McLEAN. My statement was absolutely correct. I dislike to be compelled to rise in my seat and dispute statements of the Senator from Alabama, but I can not let the occasion go by without calling attention to the facts.

Mr. HEFLIN. The board was supposed to be composed of three Democrats and two Republicans, but Governor Harding was a Republican and supported the Republican ticket in 1920.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Harding was a Democrat from Alabama. If he had the good sense to change his views later on, I commend him for it.

Mr. HEFLIN. So does Wall Street commend him.

Mr. McLEAN. He was appointed by Wilson as a Democrat. The Senator knows his statement is contrary to the record and contrary to the facts, and if he insists upon reiterating it, then, whenever I am here, I shall have to avail myself of the opportunity to call the attention of the Senate to the truth about the matter.

Mr. HEFLIN. My statements are true, and I challenge the Senator now to disprove my assertion that there were Republicans on the Federal Reserve Board at that time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. A bill (H. R. 12817) to amend and supplement the merchant act, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, in view of the fact that everyone thought we were going to take up the calendar this morning and that nothing has been done with the calendar during the morning hour, will not the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROTH] allow us to have the next two hours to proceed with the call of the calendar?

Mr. McLEAN. I think there is no objection to our coming to a vote at once on the matter which has been under discussion. I do not think the Senator from Alabama himself will object to that. I only think it is due the Committee on Banking and Currency that the question should be decided. If it is in order that we can have a separate vote on the motion, and if it is necessary to ask unanimous consent, I ask that the vote be taken first on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. I would have to make a point of order against a separation of the proposition, because it is not in accordance with the rule, as I understand it, to do that. I made the motion to refer the bill to the committee, and I suggested an instruction that the committee should act within five days.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Perhaps the Chair had better read the record:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to lay the motion of the Senator from Alabama on the table.

Mr. LODGE. I withdrew that motion at the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I have no desire to cut off debate; but I wish a direct vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. I withdraw my motion for the present.

Mr. LODGE. A motion can not be withdrawn "for the present." It is either withdrawn or not withdrawn.

Mr. HEFLIN. I withdraw it; and if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] wants to move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, I shall ask the Senate to instruct that committee to report it out, one way or the other, within five days.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama withdraws his motion to refer Senate bill 4427 to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Without objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency in accordance with the rule.

Mr. HEFLIN. I move that the Committee on Banking and Currency be instructed to report the bill out within five days.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Committee on Banking and Currency be instructed to report the bill referred to it back to the Senate within five days. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. What the Chair has read is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that is the question which was pending when the Chair laid before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. GLASS. According to the RECORD, the bill has already been referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. HEFLIN. And the motion is to instruct the committee to report back the bill within five days.

Mr. LODGE. The Chair made the announcement that the bill would be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, but of course the instructions were offered at once, and therefore the motion was not decided as to referring it. The motion is to be treated as having been vacated just as it would be by an objection. Of course, it is always done by unanimous consent. In any event the motion to instruct is a separate proposition, whether under the construction of the Chair or under my construction, and on that proposition I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], I understood, was under the impression that, no objection having been made to the reference of the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency, the Chair did refer it to the Committee on Banking and Currency. I submit that when the question was put by the Chair, that without objection the bill would be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and the Senator from Alabama immediately stated, "I move that the Committee on Banking and Currency be instructed to report back within five days," that was tantamount to an objection, and the question now before the Senate is merely the amendment upon the part of the Senator from Alabama to the motion made by the Senator from Connecticut.

The motion of the Senator from Connecticut being to refer it to the Committee on Banking and Currency, the Senator from Alabama proposes to amend the motion to refer it to the committee by instructing the committee to report the bill back within five days. The first question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama to the motion of the Senator from Connecticut to instruct the committee to report the bill back within five days.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator's view.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LODGE. I was engaged in making a parliamentary inquiry. May I be permitted to complete it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to know what has become of the unfinished business.

Mr. LODGE. It was laid before the Senate at 2 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair laid the unfinished business before the Senate at 2 o'clock.

Mr. LODGE. I quite agree with the parliamentary position as stated by the Senator from Mississippi, but for practical purposes it makes no difference whether it is considered as an amendment or a separate proposition. In either case the matter of instruction is a separate proposition. If the Senator from Alabama is ready to allow us to vote on the matter—

Mr. HEFLIN. I am ready to take a vote. The question is upon my motion, as the Chair announced it.

Mr. LODGE. It is just the same.

Mr. FLETCHER. Had we better not have the unfinished business laid aside?

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily for the purpose of voting on this proposition.

Mr. JONES of Washington. With the understanding that we proceed without any further delay to vote, I shall not object to that, but I shall not consent if it is going to take up more time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll for the ascertainment of a quorum.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Capper	Ernst	Glass
Ball	Colt	Fernald	Gooding
Borah	Couzens	Fletcher	Hale
Brookhart	Culberson	Frelinghuysen	Harrell
Bursum	Curtis	George	Harris
Cameron	Dillingham	Gerry	Harrison

Heflin	McCumber	Oddie	Stanfield
Johnson	McKellar	Overman	Sterling
Jones, Wash.	McKinley	Page	Sutherland
Kellogg	McLean	Pepper	Townsend
Kendrick	McNary	Phipps	Trammell
King	Moses	Polindexter	Underwood
Ladd	Nelson	Pomerene	Wadsworth
La Follette	New	Ransdell	Walsh, Mass.
Lenroot	Nicholson	Reed, Pa.	Walsh, Mont.
Lodge	Norbeck	Shortridge	Warren
McCormick	Norris	Smoot	Watson

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to repeat my announcement that the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] is absent on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] that the Committee on Banking and Currency be instructed to report the bill back to the Senate within five days. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] and vote "yea."

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and vote "nay."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "nay."

Mr. POMERENE (when his name was called). I have a temporary general pair with my colleague, the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], who is detained because of serious illness in his family. I understand if he were present, my colleague would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore I feel free to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FERNALD (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. FERNALD. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. ERNST (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] to the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] and let my vote stand.

Mr. HALE (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. HALE. I have a general pair with that Senator, and, being unable to secure a transfer, withdraw my vote.

Mr. KELLOGG (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. JONES of Washington (after having voted in the negative). I understand the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has not voted. He is necessarily absent, and I promised to take care of him during his absence. I am not able to secure a transfer, and therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. WATSON (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. He is absent, and I am unable to obtain a transfer. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the negative). I find that my pair, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], is not present. As I can not obtain a transfer of that pair, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to announce that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. MCKINLEY (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], who, I understand, has not voted. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER] and allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—21.
Ashurst	George	Kendrick	Trammell
Borah	Gerry	Ladd	Underwood

So Mr. HEFLIN's motion to instruct the Committee on Banking and Currency was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill introduced by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

RURAL CREDIT FACILITIES.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 4287 be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Washington is agreed to.

If there be no objection, the request of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is agreed to, and the Chair lays before the Senate the bill named by him.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States; to amend the Federal farm loan act; to amend the Federal reserve act; and for other purposes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the so-called farm credits bill which I desire may be pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

The amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKEL-LAR], which is pending, will be stated.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed to add to the bill, on page 18, after line 22, a new section, as follows:

Sec. 12. That section 13 of the Federal reserve act, as amended, be further amended by adding after the words "being eligible for discount" and before the words "but such definition shall not include," the words: "And the notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors making advances exclusively to producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state shall be eligible for such discount."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent. The pending bill has now been before the Senate for three full days. The subject matter of the bill was discussed for nearly a week in the consideration of the so-called Capper bill. It is very desirable, if this bill is to get through Congress at this session, that it be sent over to the House of Representatives as soon as is consistent with reasonable consideration here. I do not wish to force consideration, but it seems to me that if we spend the next three days upon the bill we ought to dispose of it by Wednesday next. I therefore wish to submit a request for unanimous consent that at 4 o'clock on next Wednesday debate upon the bill and amendments thereto shall cease.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that he withdraw that request until the conclusion of the debate to-day. I think by 5 o'clock this afternoon we shall be able to know a little better what we should do.

Mr. LENROOT. I am willing to do that, except I wish to say, in order to give Senators ample notice, that if we can not come to an agreement I shall ask the Senate, if the bill is not disposed of by Wednesday afternoon, to sit in evening session until it shall be disposed of.

Mr. KING. I think during the afternoon, perhaps, some agreement in reference to the matter may be reached.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, we have several times during this session by unanimous consent fixed a day upon which we should vote on bills without further debate, and I am in entire agreement with that course of procedure; but my experience here has convinced me that it is unwise at a particular hour to prevent further discussion.

The pending bill is an important measure; I think it should pass and will pass; but I believe that we ought not in the future to enter into agreements affecting important bills that debate shall cease at a particular time. I hope when the Senator from Wisconsin this afternoon asks for a unanimous-consent agreement for a vote that he will merely request that after the hour of 4 o'clock or 5 o'clock on Wednesday or Thursday, as the case may be, no Senator thereafter shall speak for more than three minutes on any one amendment. Some Senators suggest that the time be limited to five minutes. I believe that we have legislated in some instances ill-advisedly by depriving ourselves of the privilege of explaining an amendment. I should be perfectly glad and happy to see the Senator from Wisconsin ask for unanimous consent that at a certain hour all debate be limited to three minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I think there is very much force to what the Senator says; and when the matter comes up again I shall be very glad to modify my request so that beginning, say, at 1 o'clock on Wednesday the debate shall be limited to five minutes upon the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is very generous to increase it to five minutes. I think that is a better rule than to tie ourselves down so that the proposer of an amendment—and frequently the amendments are worthy and have merit—has not opportunity to discuss it. We vote in the dark just after hearing amendments read at the desk; so I am very happy that the Senator will do that.

Mr. NORBECK obtained the floor.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President—

Mr. NORBECK. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. With reference to this proposed unanimous-consent agreement, I have an important amendment to this bill involving cooperative banking which I wish to present to the Senate, and I understand that it will receive some consideration. I think the time suggested here for consideration of the bill is entirely too short.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it is impossible to hear the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. While the unanimous-consent agreement is not asked at this time, I want to say to the Senator that I think the time he has proposed is entirely too short. Nobody has any disposition to defeat this bill or to filibuster against it in any way; but it occurs to me that the Senator's proposition is more an effort to get the ship-subsidy bill back under consideration than it is to bring this bill to a final hearing. I assure the Senator that we will get to a final vote on this bill, but we certainly want time to consider this farming proposition on its merits.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Iowa I will say that this bill has been before the Senate for three days, and up to this time, outside of two speeches, there has been, I think, no real discussion of the bill, but the time has been taken up upon other matters.

Mr. BROOKHART. I want to reply to the Senator that this bill affects directly 7,000,000 farmers and their families, with a capital investment of around $80,000,000,000 and with a yearly production, even in these hard times, of eight or ten billion dollars; and yet the Senator seems to suggest that three days' consideration of a proposition involving an industry of that magnitude and that many people is reasonable consideration. I think not. I think it deserves more than that. There is not anything before the Senate that is so important.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator is, of course, at liberty to object; but now, Mr. President, I want to test the Senator from Iowa. I am going to make a unanimous-consent request now. I ask unanimous consent that while this bill is pending before the Senate debate in the Senate be confined to the subject matter of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; I object.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in the absence of Senators who may desire to submit some remarks upon other subjects, I think the Senator ought not to submit that request at this time.

Mr. LENROOT. My reason for making the request is because I am so anxious to have the real merits of this matter debated.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that he try a 10-minute limitation on debate.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is not the request now.

Mr. LENROOT. No; I was asking unanimous consent that while the bill is pending debate be confined to the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. I object to the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that there is objection. The Senator from South Dakota is recognized.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I am glad the Senate has decided not to take hasty action in this matter of farm-credit legislation. We have not gone into that matter fully yet. I had a private talk with a few Senators who do not know that the plan under consideration proposes to start up a $60,000,000 department or corporation, you might say, without a board of directors, attaching it to another department with another board of directors, which department says it will not carry out the provisions of this bill as expressed by the author if it is turned over to it.

We are told here that the farmer needs a three-year credit.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORBECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator state that the Farm Loan Board say that they would not carry out the provisions of this law if it should be turned over to them?

Mr. NORBECK. I want to say that exactly, and I am going to do differently than the Senator from Wisconsin did the other day. When he opened his argument on this bill, he requested that he be not interrupted. I am making no such request. I want Senators to feel free to interrupt me at any time.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator will remember that the Senator from Wisconsin stated that he made that request only when he was outlining the general terms of the bill, and stated that when he came to discuss the details of the bill he would welcome interruption, and he did.

Mr. NORBECK. I did not so understand the Senator, and I know that the Chair protected him many times from interruption. Yes; I want to say that Commissioner Lobdell, who will have charge of the administration of this proposed law under its terms, says that he does not believe in long-time loans. It is in the record of the hearings, which I will refer to later, that if the execution of the law is turned over to him he will not favor a single loan of over nine months, while we are holding up before the farmers a three-year intermediate credit plan. I will get to that later, however. That is not the only objection to the bill. I think if there is any one thing that the country expects of this Congress now it is fair play and good faith and earnestness. Let us deal with the question of agricultural credits seriously and fairly.

There is no occasion for me to enlarge on the necessity of a better farm-credit system. The Senator from Wisconsin has brought that out very clearly. The Secretary of Agriculture has been before the committee and reminds us that for 30 or 40 years there has been a real demand on the part of the farmers for some legislation along this line. Mr. Wallace also stated that a reduction in one-half of 1 per cent of the interest rate would be equivalent to a 20 per cent freight reduction.

We all know that the banking system of the country is not well adapted to the needs of agriculture. In fact, it has not met the requirements of general business until the passage of the Federal reserve act. But, as has been said on the best authority, the Federal reserve act tried to accommodate that business particularly which had quick turnovers. The framers of the bill seriously considered fixing a shorter time than three months when the bill was being drafted, but finally decided upon three months for commercial paper and six months for agricultural paper. But, as the Senator from Wisconsin has so well said, the farmer can not make a turnover in six months. He must have a longer period. He says: "We need credit for from nine months to three years." I agree absolutely to that. There is one of the weaknesses of the American system. While we would not exchange it for any other banking system in the world, yet its weaknesses must be recognized and changes must be made to meet conditions.

The fact was brought out in the hearings of the Banking and Currency Committee that the farmer in the Canadian Northwest borrows his money cheaper than does the Dakota farmer on this side of the line, although Canadian capital is drawn in no small degree from this country.

The Canadian branch-banking system seems to have one advantage. It makes banking and investment capital in that country almost equally available to each section.

One of the difficulties of our system is that our farmers, as we all know, are so largely dependent upon the local bank of deposit. Often this bank is a small concern. Its deposits are limited to the earnings and savings of the community, and often entirely out of proportion to the demands made upon it, especially in years of deflation or poor crops.

The country expects Congress to provide a facility for making some of the surplus funds in money centers available to the farmer at a reasonable rate of interest without the payment of usurious commissions.

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] related to the committee a very impressive incident occurring out in Wyoming about one of the best farmers there being compelled to sell his live-stock herd, not because his paper was poor but rather because it was very good. Banks in distress have to collect. Necessarily they do not attempt to collect poor risks; that is no use. Too often they put the best man in the community out of business. The savings of a lifetime are swept away. This is a condition we want to get away from.

I do not want to speak in criticism of the investigating committee that has dealt with this particular economic question—the Committee on Agricultural Inquiry. I feel they are entitled to great credit for undertaking to work out a solution of the problem. I believe they have worked earnestly and honestly with the right purpose in mind, and I feel that it is very appropriate that any legislation resulting from this investigation should bear the name of the Senator from Wisconsin. He has devoted more time to it than any other Senator, but, Mr. President, it is a big problem and the committee did not have time to consider it properly.

It took Members of Congress two years to perfect the draft of the Federal reserve act. Several amendments have since been added. The Joint Committee of Agricultural Inquiry seems to have overlooked the fact that the temporary requirements were being taken care of by the War Finance Corporation and that any plan proposed was virtually a substitution for this work. What did they propose? They first presented a bill providing for a capital of $12,000,000, this to take the place of an agency of the Government that was operating with $512,000,000 capital—$500,000,000 of original capital and the earnings that had accumulated in the meantime—and still this committee proposed seriously and pleaded earnestly that we practically accept that as the substitute.

I am glad to say that even the members of the committee that drafted this bill—Republicans and Democrats alike—have long ago abandoned that idea. I hold it not against them that they proposed the plan, which was doubtless intended to be a forward step. It is hard for Senators, who have worked faithfully on a measure, to come forward and admit that it fails to accomplish the desired purpose, but several of the members of the committees that have handled this proposed legislation have risen to the occasion. If all the Members who served on the three different committees would frankly admit we are wrestling with a big problem, and that it has not been solved any too well, we would be in a fair way to find the solution and agree upon it. Pride of authorship must not stand in the way. Our leaders should not insist on forcing through Congress a bill of doubtful value and possibly serious consequences. We should be willing to look the facts squarely in the face. If we do that, there is no danger of serious mistake.

It is well to keep in mind that the Senator from Wisconsin has given two splendid reasons for the enactment of intermediate farm credit legislation. First, make available for the farmers loans for a longer period; second, make available for agriculture some additional funds to be secured by the Government from the available investment capital of the country.

But, to my mind, there are two other reasons that should not be overlooked. One is to make some provision for the more gradual liquidation of the loans made by the War Finance Corporation, so that, in collecting, the farmer is not caused unnecessary hardship. We can also feel certain that the right kind of Government intermediate credit plan will tend to bring down interest rates on personal or chattel loans, just as certainly as would the Federal farm-loan system tend to bring down interest on farm mortgages.

Many bills have been presented. None may be perfect, but some are at least drawn along sound lines and are workable.

It was my privilege to introduce the bill proposed by the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union. This bill, as I have said, was modeled somewhat after the War Finance Corporation plan. It provides for a separate administrative board to be selected for this very purpose, men well qualified and in sympathy with the work. It provides for a capital of $200,000,000 with power to sell debentures to secure additional funds. The capital is large enough so it will accomplish its purpose. There need be no delay in getting started, as it provides for taking over a going concern, but to convert it to a permanent agency of the Government dedicated to the purpose of providing a suitable credit plan for the American farmer, supplementary to the Federal reserve plan and the Federal farm-loan plan, neither one of which adequately meets the situation. It permits and contemplates the establishment of branches or agencies in each of the States where there is a sufficient demand. It permits and suggests cooperation with the States. In other words, it provides a practical plan without unnecessary red tape.

The Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union is one of the largest farm organizations in America and its suggestion should at least have been given fair consideration by the different committees having charge of credit plans during this session of Congress.

Later, the special committee of the farm bloc requested Mr. Herbert Myrick, of Springfield, Mass., to draft an intermediate farm credit bill. Mr. Myrick has been a lifelong student of farm economics, and his advice has been valuable in the drafting of the Federal farm loan act and other legislation important to agriculture. He is at present director of the Federal Farm Loan Bank of Springfield, Mass., and is also the publisher of several conservative farm journals. Frankly, it looked to me as though Mr. Myrick's bill suggested practical elements for solving this problem. This bill provided for adequate capital, for an agency in each agricultural State. The bill was so drafted as to bring the States into the support of the system. The cooperative features were well worked out. I was disappointed, indeed, when I found that this splendid measure had so few supporters in Congress—that it could not be brought out for proper discussion and consideration. It may not be acceptable in all respects. There may be room for changes in it; but let me say these matters have not yet been considered.

I have no desire to criticize the Federal reserve bank system. Its creation was a forward step, but I do not believe that even with the amendments now pending it will be able at all to meet the demands of agriculture. We are certain of one thing, and that is its failure was admitted by Congress a year and a half ago, when it passed the legislation rehabilitating the War Finance Corporation.

The credit extensions resulting therefrom saved hundreds of banks from failure and thousands of farmers from bankruptcy. While it did not provide much additional credit, it caused banks to stop forced collections when they could secure loans through this agency. More time was given for liquidation. Forced marketing of farm products, which each day brought lower prices, came to an end. Orderly marketing was restored. Prices immediately showed an upward tendency.

We were taught a real lesson as to the effect of reasonable credit extensions. Had smaller credit extensions been made or a slower process adopted, the effect on the market might not have been perceptible. This is one reason I am fearful of voting for any measure that will result in a reduction of credit to agriculture now being made by the War Finance Corporation. The question of additional credits to the farmer is not really as important as to guard against sudden and violent contractions. He is not in position to meet unexpected demands at this time.

It is not only important that the capital provided be adequate, but it is of equal, if not more, importance that the organization or machinery set up be more workable than that provided in the bill now pending before this body. My objections are fairly well set out in the conclusions of my minority report, as follows:

- In view of—
- (a) The uncertainty of expert witnesses who appeared before the committee as to the workability of this bill;
 - (b) The lack of capital provided to meet the need of the agriculturist;
 - (c) The cumbersome method proposed in moving funds from one Federal land bank district to another;
 - (d) The uncertainty of successful administration when handled as a side line by Federal farm loan banks, which are inexperienced in this line of work and without facilities for handling same;
 - (e) The failure to place the administration of this proposed legislation in the hands of the War Finance Corporation, which has already demonstrated its ability to successfully function under the provisions of existing law, or in the hands of some separate agency;
 - (f) The danger that the offering for sale of farm loan debentures (by 12 different district banks) will adversely affect the market for Federal farm loan bonds; and
 - (g) The unscientific character of the bill in general—
- It is my opinion that this proposed legislation is too experimental in its nature to be of practical benefit as intended, and same is not sufficient in scope to adequately meet the present situation.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I would be very glad to have the Senator elaborate somewhat on the suggestion that the putting into operation of this system would adversely affect the sale of farm loan bonds. Will the Senator please point out in what way that would result?

Mr. NORBECK. I will point that out a little later through the statements of the expert witnesses who came before the committee. They called attention to the danger of that; and I think Mr. Leffingwell, formerly Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, was one of them. I think Mr. Lobdell was very specific in saying in substance, "I do not want the job of selling these debentures if you are going to authorize debentures under the Capper bill also," and the Senate has already done that.

Any credit plan has two main parts: First, get the money; and, second, loan it safely and discreetly. Therefore, there are two questions before us. First how can we best get the funds? Second, how can we best distribute them where they are really needed? Is not that all there is to it? If we keep those two thoughts in mind we can work toward the solution of this question and forget any bills that may be pending. Mr. President, let it be remembered that I am not here saying that any of these farm-credit bills should be adopted in toto, and I may add that the Lenroot bill has been decidedly improved in the various stages through which it has gone in the last few months.

The bills before us may be divided into two classes. In the matter of getting the money, some of them propose a central board with a central fund. No one will say you can not get the money by following the plan of the War Finance Corporation.

The Lenroot plan does not provide for any central fund, but on the other hand provides for setting up a new department in connection with each of the 12 different land banks and letting each one go out and get the funds the best it can. It may work or it may not. I find that who I consider were the expert witnesses before the committee were very much in doubt as to whether the funds could be secured in this matter.

I was taken severely to task the other day by my friend, the Senator from Wisconsin. He did not mean it in any unkind way, but he took me to task for stating in the minority report that none of the witnesses before the committee believed that we could secure the necessary funds in the way he suggested. I had in mind Mr. Meyer, an able financier; I had in mind Mr. Leffingwell, to whom I have previously referred; I had in mind Governor Platt, of the Federal Reserve Board; I had in mind the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon; but the Senator caught me in a mistake. I had made an error. I had overlooked the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin did testify before the committee that we could, and I beg his pardon.

His reference to the fact that I had not read the report was true. But I did not read it because I was present and heard the Senator make his statement, as the record will show.

The Lenroot bill, briefly, proposes that each land bank shall be provided with $5,000,000 as capital for personal-credit purposes and borrow what they can with that as security. I made the further mistake of saying that this capital could not be loaned. I based that on a careful reading of the bill. It seemed ambiguous to me, so I examined the committee report, which I understood was drafted by my friend the Senator, and I thought that would clear the matter up; but, as the Senator said the other day, the explanation is that there is a mistake in the report; so I may be excused for that error.

One of my criticisms of this bill is that there is no regard given to the needs of the different sections of the country. There is an abundance of banking funds and investment capital in the United States, if it were well distributed. Everybody admits that. Foreign governments can come here and sell almost all the bonds they like, and the money goes out. Therefore, the thing we are aiming at is to get this investment capital nearer to the farmer. But the presumption of this bill is that the need is the same in each district; that the need is the same in Springfield, Mass., as it is in Omaha, Nebr., and that it is the same in Berkeley, Calif., as it is in a southern land-bank district. The experience of the country shows the opposite to be true. It does not take a banker to know that you must get money from the money centers. But, by this bill we propose to establish farm-credit banks in the money centers and give them exactly the same capital and exactly the same chance as have those in the sections where there is really demand for the money. What will be the result? The upshot will be that some bank will fail to function for lack of demand; others will fail to function because they can not supply one-fourth of the needs of the district. In other words, lack of mobility is one of the criticisms of the plan of the bill, and it grows out of the fact that you have not a central board clothed with authority to mobilize the resources of all the banks.

The Special Committee of Agricultural Inquiry commend most highly the mobility possible under the Federal reserve bank act, where the central board has authority to order the district banks to come to the relief of each other. I regret that the same committee that recommended this feature so highly in the Federal reserve act omitted it from the intermediate farm-credit plan. Under the pending bill, it is purely voluntary with the district land banks as to whether they will assist each other. It could hardly be expected that one bank would borrow on its own credit to assist some other far-away bank.

This matter was called to the attention of Mr. Hoover, the Secretary of Commerce, who is in favor of this bill. He was before the Banking Committee to help in expediting the bill, and when his attention was called to this weakness of the plan, he said—page 381 of the hearings: "My impression is it might as well be made obligatory and pool the whole lot. That is my feeling about it. Inasmuch as they have to take the joint responsibility for these notes they might as well pool these resources." He was a friendly witness, a witness trying to help in perfecting needed legislation; but his suggestion was not followed.

One of the questions to be decided is how large a capital is required for this purpose. The difference of opinion is much smaller than when the proponents of this bill suggested that a total of $12,000,000 would be sufficient. By various steps this has been increased to $60,000,000. If we continue to give some consideration to the merits of this question we will by slow but easy stages arrive at the conclusion that about $200,000,000 should be the minimum. We know fairly well what is needed. We have the experience of the War Finance Corporation. Let us not pass an act that is restrictive in its nature. It would be unfortunate indeed if the enactment of this bill should result in the farm loan banks undertaking to do the work now performed by the War Finance Corporation. I have no authority to speak for the corporation, but the rumor has been about that they feel the passage of the Lenroot bill will relieve them of this burden. The intent of Congress could easily be so interpreted.

The first result of the passage of this bill may simply be a restriction of agricultural credit instead of a provision for additional funds.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. NORBECK. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I inquire of the Senator whether, in his view, as we return, happily, I hope, to a condition of normalcy, the demand for these credits will be as great as they were at the period which seemed to demand the re-creation of the War Finance Corporation? I invite the Senator's attention to the coming year and the year following, with the slight improvement which we are witnessing in our commercial and industrial life, with a view to asking him the question whether he believes that it is essential to maintain such a large fund as $500,000,000, as it is now, with the War Finance Corporation for the purpose of extending credits to the farmers and to the stock growers, in view of the facilities which are afforded to the large banking interests of the United States, with their assets of practically $40,000,000,000, and with the fact, which is obvious to those who are familiar with the situation, that in many of the banking districts to-day they can not find persons or corporations to borrow their money, which is piling up in the treasuries.

Mr. NORBECK. In answer to that I will state that the bill I have introduced does not provide for a capital of $500,000,000; it provides for a capital of only $200,000,000. But speaking further on the matter, I will state that I do not claim to be able to foresee what emergencies might arise. If the Federal reserve bank had not been able to stand a much greater strain than even its proponents thought it would meet, it would not have stood up; and if we provide credit facilities for the farmers, let us take the same measure of safety as when we provide for commerce and industry. Therefore give them the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield.

Mr. KING. I agree entirely with the Senator that all facilities should be afforded for agriculture and the live-stock industry to obtain legitimate and proper credit. I invite the Senator's attention to the fact that with the amendments which are being offered, and doubtless will prevail, to the Federal reserve law the opportunities to extend credit to agriculture through the Federal reserve system will be greatly enlarged. Undoubtedly, if we make eligible for rediscount agricultural paper for a period of nine months, there will be millions and tens of millions of dollars loaned to agriculture by the Federal reserve banks which in the past have been denied.

Does the Senator take that into account in considering now the character of legislation which we offer in the creation of an independent organization? In my opinion, the Federal reserve banks will covet the paper of agriculturists. With six and nine months' limit, with the competition which the pending bill would create, and with the competition that is going on throughout the country to-day, there would be a desire upon the part of the Federal reserve banks, in my opinion, to extend credit to the farmers and they would not hesitate to take good agricultural paper from any part of the United States. I direct the Senator's attention to that fact, hoping that he will amplify it in his discussion of the needs of agriculture and the need for the particular legislation now before us.

Mr. NORBECK. The Senator may remember that I was a supporter of the amendment to the Federal reserve act giving the farmer's paper nine months' time. I know it can not be harmful; I believe it would be helpful. To what extent it would be helpful it is impossible to foretell.

The fact was brought out forcibly by some witnesses before the Committee on Banking and Currency, men who were experts in their line, men who have made a life study of the question of finance, that many sections of the country have banking facilities which are inadequate; that even though the money were available the local banks dare not borrow, they dare not underwrite, they dare not involve themselves. That is especially true of nine months' paper. They know the farmers can not make their turnover in time to take care of the paper, but the psychology is bad because, while it is easy to say to the farmer, "The Federal reserve bank can take care of you; they will take care of you; we can prove it to you," yet they invariably make answer and say, "Yes; but they did not." If we go to the banker and say, "The Federal reserve bank will take care of you, they are able to do it, they have the funds available to do it," the banker replies, "Yes; but they did not take care of us." In other words, you may go to them and say, "We will renew in nine months, and it really means three years' time," but they are not sure what it does mean. They are afraid it may mean nine months, and they know the farmer can not make the turnover in nine months.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. NORBECK. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. What always happens, if the farmer is not able to pay at the expiration of the shortest period mentioned, is that the bank at once grows uneasy and presses for payment, so that very fact tends to bring on a local panic so far as the farmer is concerned. Is not that the fact?

Mr. NORBECK. The Senator is entirely right.

The plan proposed for raising money is, as I have stated before, for the district land banks to borrow by the sale of debentures. The question is, Will those debentures sell? Are they always readily salable? The Senator from Wisconsin assures us that we can take the $60,000,000 of capital and multiply it by 10 and have $600,000,000. That is easy, but we know that men who have money are often finicky or, we think, unreasonable, when we try to borrow from them, but they insist on applying their own judgment in the matter. Sometimes it is difficult to tell in advance how they may view the thing. The Committee on Banking and Currency tried to ascertain that, and the question was asked of witnesses who appeared before them.

I want to refer to Commissioner Lobdell's testimony. I look upon Judge Lobdell, head of the Farm Loan Board, as one of the most capable and most experienced and careful men. He has had long banking experience in a Western State. His experience is very unusual. I would value his judgment highly, as to what he thinks about it.

The Senator from Wisconsin quoted from the testimony as an expression of Commissioner Lobdell, as follows:

The Lenroot bill, speaking broadly, is well worked out and proposes a practical and workable plan of meeting the situation.

That statement, isolated from all the testimony of the witness, leaves an entirely erroneous impression.

First, it must be kept in mind that Commissioner Lobdell is not speaking of a three-year plan of loans; in fact, he suggested that under his supervision nine months would be the limit, and suggested further that debentures of less than six months be permitted. He said, in fact (page 249 of the hearings):

I was going to say that if the administration were intrusted to the present Farm Loan Board, I would not make a chattel loan to anybody for more than nine months under any circumstances.

I say this not in criticism of Judge Lobdell, but he is not much in favor of the plan. His experience and training are such as lead him to take the other viewpoint. He thinks there is not much value in it.

In fairness to Commissioner Lobdell I quote from the record, page 218:

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think these debentures would be salable?

Mr. LOBDELL. I understand a much more eminent authority than I on this question dodged it a day or two ago. No, sir; I do not.

This is a case where the Senator from Wisconsin insists that "No, sir" means "Yes, sir." I fail to understand it in that way.

Then, again, Judge Lobdell continued:

Not because they (these debentures) are all unsound, but because they lodge between the desires of two types of investors. I may be pardoned, for I know something about the debenture market. I have sold $600,000 of them. There are two distinct types of investors—the short-time investor and the bank of quick turnover, and the permanent investor—and the three-year investment is too short for him and it is too long for anybody else.

On page 248 he stated that his remarks as to the unsalability of debentures "should be confined to the three-year debenture." He thinks the six months' debenture would be salable, but what good is a six months' debenture for agricultural needs?

In view of the uncertainty of securing funds, I suggest that the passage of the bill at this time would probably prove to be a real disappointment. When we revived the War Finance Corporation a year and a half ago we took no such chances. We provided an abundant fund to be paid from the Treasury, and also provided for the sale of debentures, if needed.

Commissioner Lobdell also called attention to the fact that the debentures provided under the Capper bill might adversely affect the market for debentures provided under the Lenroot bill. I quote him verbatim:

If the two measures were passed and the task contemplated in the Lenroot bill were assigned to the Farm Loan Board, I would want the debenture issue suggested in the Capper bill eliminated.

They were not eliminated.

There is room for difference of opinion as to how much funds should be taken out of the Treasury for this purpose. Some Senators contend that it is all wrong. If so, we were all guilty when we rehabilitated the War Finance Corporation a year and a half ago. Is it possible that such a capable financier as Eugene Meyer, jr., advocated and worked out a poor plan? No, Mr. President; I think he took the only course that was certain to be successful. Theoretically, we should not go to the Treasury for this purpose, except so far as it is necessary. When it comes to actual practice we find that it amounts to about the same thing, whether the Treasury borrows the money or it is borrowed by the agencies proposed in the pending bill.

Where do the funds in the Treasury come from? Mostly from the sale of Government securities, do they not? Then, no matter which of the suggested bills becomes a law, we provide funds for the farm-credit system by pledging the Government's credit. The Treasury can borrow by the sale of certificates or bonds. Funds may be borrowed by the Farm Loan Board in practically the same manner by selling its bonds. The one practical difference may be that in this case a higher rate of interest must be paid.

Mr. KING. Am I to understand that the Senator from South Dakota believes in a banking system which is founded upon a permanent furnishing of capital by the Government of the United States, or does the Senator not believe that where the Government furnishes the capital, as we did in the case of the War Finance Corporation, it ought to be by reason of some exigency, and that we ought to approximate as nearly as we may the supply of credit for commercial and agricultural and other purposes by the utilization of the large fund of private capital which the Senator confesses exists in the United States? It would seem to me that there are conditions that would justify the taxing of the people in order to furnish money for the establishment of a bank for the purpose of extending credit to agriculture and to other activities of our country, but, generally speaking, does not the Senator think that the best and the soundest banking system is one which rests upon private capital, the introduction through the machinery provided by the Government into the avenues of trade and commerce of the actual savings of the people of the United States?

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, the theory of the Senator is quite accurate. We should not do any more than is necessary, and I submit that even under the proposed Lenroot bill that is exactly what is proposed to be done.

Mr. KING. I concede that.

Mr. NORBECK. We might go further and speculate whether it is a kind of subsidy, as has been charged. We may also ask whether the relief for the railroads is a subsidy, and whether the proposed subsidy for the shipping industry is all wrong. We might inquire whether the subsidies to the manufacturers under the tariff bill are wrong. We may go into it endlessly. But I wish to make the statement that if this does look a little like subsidy I would not shy at it, for the farmer has the short end and we should not be so concerned about which theory we apply for his relief.

Mr. STERLING. But, Mr. President, if the Senator from South Dakota will yield to me, as I understand my colleague, it is his position that the exigency exists now?

Mr. NORBECK. Yes, certainly; exactly so.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. NORBECK. Yes; certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. When we put unlimited credit back of commercial enterprises and speculations, it seems to be entirely legitimate, does it not? Nobody falls out with one about that. When every kind of paper is subject to discount, and the Government with its unlimited gold reserve circulates hundreds of millions of dollars of Federal reserve notes, that is all right. The trouble, however, comes when it is desired to extend aid to the worst oppressed class of people; then it is feared that we may be taxing somebody in order to aid the farmer, is it not?

Mr. NORBECK. The Senator from Arkansas is right as to that.

The reasons given by the proponents of the pending bill for attaching its administration to another department and running it as a side line to the farm loan banks, are two: First, to avoid delay; second, to avoid expense. Which would cause more delay, start up new departments in connection with the land banks, or take the War Finance Corporation, already a great and successful concern, as proposed in the other bills? It is my opinion that the Lenroot plan would involve the greater delay. The element of time, however, is not so important when we consider that a bill providing for an extension of the life of the War Finance Corporation has already passed the Senate and is quite certain of becoming a law. There is plenty of time in which to set up the agency that will perform the best service. Therefore, the question resolves itself into one of expense only.

I would certainly be pleased to bring about economy, but this is the first time we have ever known of a business starting with a large capital where it was felt that it could not afford to have its own board of directors and to pay them for giving supervision to the $60,000,000 business. Really, I am fearful this kind of economy will lower efficiency and lead to losses.

The larger farm organizations of the country have expressed themselves in favor of a distinctly separate agency with its own board of directors. Why not heed the expression of the farm organizations in this matter?

I realize that we can get into endless argument here as to who indorses or approves this bill. The other day the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] read a strong indorsement of his bill from the Washington representative of the National Grange. This statement said in substance: "I have examined all the proposed bills up to date and yours is the best." The date was not given by the Senator, but it appears in the RECORD. The date that letter was written was one month before I introduced the farmers' union bill. That date was before the Simmons bill was introduced. That date was before the Myrick bill was introduced. I believe the representative of the grange had good reasons for writing as he did at that time.

Mr. President, I would have joined him in such an indorsement at that time. The RECORD also shows that some cooperative marketing organizations met here and indorsed this bill. They possibly felt that it was adequate. One of their representatives before the Banking and Currency Committee put great stress upon the fact that the farmer would soon be able to secure his funds through ordinary banking channels by the assistance of the Federal reserve bank. The Senator also read an indorsement from some cattle organization in far-away Texas, to whom the pending bill seems entirely satisfactory. These people will properly operate largely under the so-called Capper live stock bill, anyway. However, I have no doubt that a good many farmers and farm organizations will look with favor upon any farm-credit legislation proposed, especially if they are given to understand that this is the best that can be secured from an unwilling Congress.

Let us be fair with the RECORD. I telephoned the grange office the other day. The chief representative was not in the office, but his assistant informed me that they had indorsed the Lenroot bill, because it seemed to them they must accept this or get nothing. Why should they not indorse it under such circumstances?

The able Senator from Wisconsin informed this body that the Farm Bureau Federation favored his bill with certain changes. That is true; it favored it "with certain changes." What are the changes? The changes are mainly the changes that I am contending for here.

I have here a letter from the American Farm Bureau Federation at Washington, written on January 17, from which I shall read only a few lines:

With the intermediate credits subject now before the Senate we wish to urge upon the Members the importance of earnest consideration and passage of a measure which will, by its terms, authorize and provide a workable system for the use of the American farmer. To be so, we believe it must be administered by a separate board and so constituted that it will function freely in supplying the farmers' needs.

In other words, Mr. President, they are asking for a separate administrative board, an abundant fund, and a mobile plan—that is what they are contending for. This is not an indorsement of the Lenroot bill; it is an indorsement of my position. As we all know, the Farm Bureau Federation is one of the largest organizations in America.

Put the question squarely to any of the larger and conservative farm organizations, "Do you want the Lenroot bill?" and they will reply, "Yes; we will take a half loaf rather than none." If, however, they are asked, "Do you favor this bill in preference to other bills?" they will reply, "That is another question; we have never said that we did."

The farmers of the country are pleading with you that the administration of this plan be placed with a separate board—a board that is in sympathy with the work; a board that believes in the theory of the bill; a board that desires to provide credit for the farmer along the same line as the Senator from Wisconsin advocates, namely, loans of from nine months to three years.

Let us not enact another fake such as the postal savings bank law. If we do, it will not serve an important purpose. I am not criticizing Commissioner Lobdell for saying that he would not make any loans longer than nine months. I know this view is shared quite generally by bankers, who prefer short-time paper. The bankers always argue that the possibility of renewals is sufficient protection for the farmers, but the Senator from Wisconsin insists that we should provide a credit system especially adapted to the farmers' needs—slow turnovers of from nine months to three years. If we are to do that, let us place the operation of the system in the hands of men who view the matter in the same way as does the Senator from Wisconsin. The administrators of the fund must believe in the purpose of the law.

Several of the experts who appeared before the committee called attention to the fact that the Farm Loan Board was not equipped to handle the matter of personal credits or chattel loans. They thought it required a different kind of personnel—men trained along different lines. I have often heard the suggestion about the Senate that it was quite logical to even put this class of farm loans under the management of the Farm Loan Board. But we overlook the fact that under the proposed law it is not intended to make a single loan to farmers. This bill does not provide for farmers' produce credit at all, except through the banks. It proposes to deal with the banker, who in turn will lend the money to the farmer. If that is to be the only plan followed, we will find the district offices badly located; they should be as nearly as possible in the Federal reserve bank cities.

The Federal reserve bank is in close touch with the bankers of the country. Up-to-date information can be secured. But would it not be better to also establish an agency in each of the States where the business to be done would justify it? This had been suggested by Mr. Myrick, and Commissioner Lobdell suggested permissive authority be granted to establish branches in the States.

Mr. President, the history of this legislation is as follows: First, the Joint Committee of Agricultural Inquiry wrestled with the problem, as I have said. I believe they worked conscientiously to find a solution, and they made a start. They found there was great need of an intermediate credit system for the relief of agriculture. They worked out a bill. The measure was crude, it is true—but nevertheless it was a beginning. They presented it to the farm bloc for indorsement, but the members of the bloc called attention to the utter inadequacy of same. The result was that a motion was carried to refer this bill, together with other rural credit bills, to a special committee to be appointed by the chairman of the bloc, and he to act as chairman of the committee. The instructions were to draft a new measure embodying the best features of each bill. There was a delay of many months, and finally the committee reported the Lenroot bill, with certain changes, to the farm bloc. For the first time I learned that the special committee had given no consideration to any other measure.

Of course they found it difficult to harmonize the best features of each bill, because the two plans proposed are radically different. The bloc twice refused to approve the Lenroot bill with the suggested changes.

Members who served on the committee have stated both publicly and privately that they regret the necessity of supporting the Lenroot bill. A leading member of the committee said: "I am frank to say it is my third choice. I favored the Simmons bill first, the Norbeck bill second, and the Lenroot bill third, but I understand the administration has decided which bill we must have, and I do not want to stand in the way of farmers' legislation."

We have heard the statement made that the administration would be against any other credit bill. I have, however, investigated for myself, and I am fully satisfied that there is nothing to that statement. I believe it has been circulated for the purpose of discouraging the consideration of other measures. The administration has not expressed a preference as to the different measures. The administration is simply on record as favoring some substantial and practical farm-credit legislation. But under a misconception as to the attitude of the administration a great many Senators are committed to his bill.

The bill was brought before the farm bloc for consideration on two different occasions, and each time failed to get its indorsement.

The Committee on Banking and Currency held hearings for two weeks. Close attention was given to this bill, also the Capper live stock bill. But, Mr. President, the committee did not go into the question from the standpoint of credit for the farmer. It absolutely ignored other bills before them. They took it up entirely from the standpoint of trying to perfect the bills above referred to, apparently selected in advance. We could not get an hour's consideration of any other farmers' credit bill before the committee, although the farmers' union bill was introduced by me in April, last year, and has never been considered by the committee.

Possibly the best solution of this whole question is to refer the matter back to the committee for further consideration. This bill must be radically changed to accomplish its purpose or one of the other bills substituted in place of same.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, did not the Committee on Banking and Currency consider the Norbeck bill in connection with the Lenroot bill and other bills?

Mr. NORBECK. There was not an hour's consideration of any bill except the Capper bill and the Lenroot bill. My bill was read hastily to the committee; objections were raised to two or three little things in it, which I offered to change. I have changed them and have reintroduced the bill.

Speaking on this bill the other day, the Senator from Wisconsin referred to the minority report and declared:

The farmers do not want charity.

No; certainly they do not want charity. Nobody has proposed any charity for them. It is not fair to charge them with seeking charity because they insist on credit legislation adapted to their needs. Was the rehabilitation of the War Finance Corporation an act of charity? I heard no one say so at the time. How can it be charity to suggest now that a permanent, workable plan of sufficient scope be enacted into law? I insist, Mr. President, that this charity reference has no place in the discussion of this question.

We overlook the fact that during the period of inflation all prices went high except that of wheat. This was actually reduced below market prices by Government order and held down. The loss to the people of my State was probably $100,000,000. Now our attention is called to the fact that the War Finance Corporation has made loans to South Dakota people to the amount of about $15,000,000, or less than one-sixth of the money that was taken away from the farmers by Government wheat control. Is any Senator going to insist that these loans are an act of charity?

One would think from the debate here that the farmers were seeking to borrow large additional sums of money. This is not true. The farmer is asking, first, that the Government assist him in a fair way to secure a better proportionate price for his products. His dollar is worth only 68 cents as compared to pre-war levels, because nearly everything that he buys carries a high price.

This bill ignores the fact that the loans in the Omaha district were about $50,000,000. It proposes to set up a department or bureau with $5,000,000 capital for the Omaha district. It is entirely too small and out of proportion to that provided for other districts.

Mr. President, criticism has been made on this floor of the suggestion in the minority report "that some provision be made in rural-credit legislation whereby farmers, who are financially responsible, can conveniently associate themselves into groups for the purpose of securing loans for the individual upon the indorsement of the group." The Senator from Wisconsin inquires who is going to pay for the operation of such a system. He asks: "Is it the farmer?" The question requires a frank answer. I would say: "Most certainly it is the farmer." He is not asking that we lend him money at less than cost. I will admit that most of the loans will be made through banks, and that there will seldom be demand for credit extended to a farmer group. But the provision should be in the law so that it is available. The highest authorities on banking matters have stated at the hearings before the committee that in certain sections the banks were unable to extend credit further. There must be a pretty definite relation between the bank's capital and the amount of business that it does. Banks in such communities might be not only willing but pleased to help the farmer form these temporary organizations for the purpose of securing the loans. All I am asking is that you provide the plan. Occasionally we find bankers who are unwilling to extend reasonable credit even when the funds are available. There were banks in my State who refused to take money from the War Finance Corporation, because the margin of interest was lower than what they customarily charged. They were afraid that making some loans at less than 10 per cent would tend to injure their business in the future, and they did not have sufficient funds available to even provide credit when a farmer was willing to pay 10 per cent.

These are only exceptional cases, but they are real. We should, if possible, protect the farmer against this kind of a condition. It can only be done by providing a method of doing business direct with the Government. Even though the method be rather slow, cumbersome, and expensive, it will at least be a way out. When the farmer finds the banker unwilling to extend reasonable credit on good security, he can say to Mr. Banker, "If you can not accommodate me, I will get the money in another way," and you may be certain that the banker will do his best to hold his customer. A plan like this, I believe, would prove to be a very helpful thing and would cause no expense to the Government and would not work unfairly to any person.

I also call your attention to the fact that Mr. Leffingwell said he thought it would be unwise to unload on the Federal Farm Loan Board—an organization created for making loans on real-estate mortgages, which is a relatively simple operation—the business of supervising a farm-credit bank.

This bill in its present form does not have the indorsement of the experts who were asked to come and advise with the Committee on Banking and Currency on this legislation. Some thought the bill unnecessary, in view of the extension of the War Finance Corporation. Some favored the bill, but suggested important changes to make it workable. The Secretary of the Treasury called attention to the necessity of reorganizing the farm-loan system if a line of personal credit was to be added.

Why give the farmer an unworkable plan? Why provide inadequate capital? Why put the administration of the act in the hands of people who are unfriendly and who will not carry out the purpose of the act as interpreted by the author of the bill?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORBECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. LENROOT. For information, I should like to know if the Senator can tell us what bill the farm bloc did indorse. I do not happen to be a member of it, and I am asking for information.

Mr. NORBECK. I want to say that the only motions that were ever made in the farm bloc to indorse any bill were to indorse the Lenroot bill, and the motions did not prevail.

Mr. President, I deplore the way in which this matter has been handled. I do not agree with those who say that we must take this bill because we can not get anything better. I believe that if this matter had been pressed in the beginning of this Congress, or a little earlier, if it had not been delayed so long, we would now have a satisfactory bill enacted. We have provided legislation for the protection of every interest. The farmer's credit legislation comes last. We can hardly argue with you now; we can only plead with you.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. NORBECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. LENROOT. Is not the Senator aware that this bill has been delayed for nearly a year at the request of the members of the farm bloc, because it was represented that the farm bloc wished to get together and agree upon some measure, and for that reason alone I did not press the measure for something like a year?

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, that question should be addressed to the committee who had the bill in charge during those months. Several members of it are present. I will not attempt to speak for them. They tell me that they have been at work on the bill; but, anyway, we are getting in at the late end of the session. We are getting in after every other interest has been taken care of.

Mr. LENROOT. Again I wish to assure the Senator from South Dakota, if that be true, that it is the fault of the farm bloc, not the fault of anybody else.

Mr. NORBECK. I want to remind the Senator again that I did not have the pleasure of serving on the committee of the farm bloc that handled that matter. I know that the Senator from Wisconsin did not, either, but he was in close touch with them, and they finally brought out his bill with a few changes.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NORBECK. I do.

Mr. BROOKHART. I want to suggest in reference to that matter that the proceedings of this whole session have been directed toward another purpose. There have been proposals of night sessions, 11 o'clock sessions, recesses, and all that, for the purpose of promoting a little enterprise known as a certain shipping bill, involving the interests of only a few people; but no fair, reasonable chance has been given to consider farm legislation on its merits at all since I have been here. Nobody in the farm bloc that I know of is trying to delay this legislation. They are all trying to boost it. They all wanted to get it before the Senate and give it full consideration, and after doing that and getting out an inadequate bill like this, they want to dispose of it in three days and get back to the shipping bill.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to his colleague?

Mr. NORBECK. I do.

Mr. STERLING. I do not like to, and yet I feel that I ought to challenge a little the statement of the Senator from Iowa in regard to the shipping bill having interfered with other legislation, because I remember the announcement of the Senator who had in charge the shipping bill that as soon as an agricultural credits bill was reported he would lay aside the shipping bill or ask unanimous consent that it be temporarily laid aside, and it has been laid aside from time to time for the consideration of other bills and has not occupied a moment of the Senate's time, except the time in which the Senator asked to lay the shipping bill aside.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NORBECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to add what I believe to be a proper correction to the statement of the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] when he says that the shipping bill was laid aside voluntarily. The shipping bill was not laid aside voluntarily for any agricultural credit legislation that came from the Agricultural Committee, but only for legislation that came from the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. STERLING. Well, it was agricultural credit legislation for which the bill was laid aside. I do not think the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who had in charge the shipping bill, distinguished between the bills that might be reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and those that might be reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; there was not any laying aside of anything that came from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry for the farmer. It had to come from the Banking and Currency Committee in order to enjoy that blessed privilege.

Mr. STERLING. So far as that is concerned, we all agreed that it was agricultural credit legislation, from whatever committee reported.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the Senator from South Dakota yielded the floor?

Mr. NORBECK. Yes; I am all through, Mr. President.

Mr. FLETCHER. I merely wish to suggest that that does not interfere with the comment of the Senator from Iowa that the disposition is to hurry through the consideration of these bills in order to get back to the ship subsidy bill.

During the delivery of Mr. NORBECK's speech,

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. NORBECK. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask the Senator to make it 12 o'clock. It is very difficult for Senators to get here by 11 o'clock, and we lose about 20 minutes in securing a quorum. When we meet at 11 it keeps the Senators away from their outside business. I shall certainly try in every way I can to expedite the bill under consideration. I am very much in favor of it, and I want to see it become a law as soon as possible. I hope the Senator will make it 12 instead of 11. All of us have duties to attend to in the forenoon.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator will use his good offices with Senators on the other side to see that there is no lack of a quorum if we meet at 12, I will accede to his request.

Mr. McKELLAR. I assure my friend that I shall do all I can in that direction.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well; I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I merely raise this question because of the intimation of the Senator from South Dakota, made in the utmost good faith, that somebody—he did not say who—was responsible for this agricultural credit bill being brought in at this late date. I would like to have the record straight. This bill was introduced by me more than a year ago. I secured very promptly the appointment of a subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency. On March 10, 1922, almost a year ago, I appeared before that subcommittee and argued in favor of the passage of this bill. At the request of members of the farm bloc I did not press the bill, because it was represented to me that the farm bloc were discussing the whole question of farm credit legislation and would like to have the Committee on Banking and Currency take no action until they were ready to make some report. I acceded to that, and, in view of that fact, I do not think it is quite fair to apply any criticism to me or to the Committee on Banking and Currency when, if there be anyone responsible for the delay in this credit legislation, it is the farm bloc itself; and I am not criticizing them.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, in answer to that let me say that I am a member of the farm bloc and of the Banking and Currency Committee, and I have never heard of any such request passing back and forth. I want to say, further, that I am not charging any delay on the part of the able Senator from Wisconsin. As I said in the beginning, I think he has worked conscientiously and did the best he could; but wherever the responsibility, we find that we have passed legislation desired by nearly every other industry of the country, reducing the taxes of the rich, providing a tariff for the manufacturers, and giving relief to the railroads, but we do not know if we have any real support for a practical farmers' credit bill. I am simply making the point that whoever is responsible, it is poor strategy that we should be compelled at the eleventh hour to beg for this farm relief legislation.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, wherever the responsibility may lie for the initiation of measures for the relief of agriculture, or for delay in their consideration, the now pending Lenroot-Anderson bill and the Norbeck bill reported to-day, when together they have become one law, will constitute the third measure enacted by this Congress seeking to afford credit and relief to the agricultural and live-stock interests of the country.

The bill thus contrived ought to pass. Doubtless it will pass. The farmer and the stockman were the first to suffer and have been the last to recover from the liquidation in prices and credits which followed the post-war inflation. The relief made available under the several measures will improve the farmer's position as a merchant. He will not be driven, as he has been driven in the past, to sell at sacrificial prices; that is, to make a loss on his year's labor, whereas if he had been able to wait for the market he might have made cost or profit. Herein lies the true merit of the Capper bill, the Lenroot-Anderson bill, and the Norbeck bill. It was in affording such relief that the War Finance Corporation and Eugene Meyer rendered so notable a service to the farmers and to the whole people.

The situation of the great majority of the farmers and stockmen of this country, which we hope to improve by the recently passed and pending measures, is notably better than it was last summer and last fall. Corn, which sold in the autumn of 1921 at 20 cents at country elevator points, is now selling at 50 to 60 cents. Wool, which sold at 15 to 18 cents on the western ranges in September, 1921, is now selling at about 35 cents. The farm price of hogs in December ranged from $6 to $6.50 a hundred; it is now from $7.50 to $8. Lambs, which were difficult to sell at $3 to $5, are now selling at $10 to $12. Beef cattle, which sold as low as $4.62 a hundred in December, 1921, are now bringing from $5.50 to $6. Sheep, which sold in November, 1921, at $3.84 a hundred, are now bringing $6 and $7.

The three measures, to which I have referred, considered as a group, are calculated chiefly to make available to the farmer in a degree hitherto unknown, the intermediate credits referred to by the junior Senator from Wisconsin in his opening address. There has been a great need for funds which could not be secured by short-time paper, and to secure which it was neither practical nor useful to make real-estate mortgages. I am confident that with such changes as experience may advise, we shall hold to the principles embodied in the Capper Act and the Lenroot-Anderson bill, now before us. I am not so certain about the results which we may expect from the Norbeck bill. It contemplates the granting of credits to Europe, or, shall I say, it contemplates the discovery or establishment of credits hitherto hidden or unavailable. If the power conferred upon the War Finance Corporation under its terms were to be exercised by anyone less experienced, less able, less prudent, less tried, than the present director of the corporation, we might hesitate to accept the amendment. But considering the great importance of exports to the improvement of farm prices in America, considering the careful terms of the Norbeck bill and the personal capacity and experience of the director of the War Finance Corporation, I am clear that it would be a mistake not to add the Norbeck bill to the Lenroot-Anderson bill.

We do not want to leave anything undone which in good sense and in good faith we may do further to improve the economic condition of the farmer, who, after all, offers to the American manufacturer his greatest market, and thus assures to the American worker his wage. Nevertheless, Mr. President, in doing all that we can do at this time we should not convey the impression that agricultural prices are wholly determined by conditions which these bills can affect. Before long we shall have to press for a further reduction in the freight rates on agricultural staples, and a little later we shall have to meet the great and serious problem of providing adequate water transportation from the Great Lakes to the seaboard.

In the meantime the markets of Europe are dominated by factors largely beyond our control or influence. No one will gainsay that this was true during the war, when the allied armies and the civil populations of the allied States were supplied with vast unprecedented quantities of manufactures and foodstuffs, first, on the credit of the allied governments, and later on the credit of the Government of the United States. Shipments of breadstuffs from America to Europe multiplied manifold, with a consequent increase in acreage and increased cost of production. We could not continue, but, nevertheless, Mr. President, the exports of farm products to Europe in quantity and in value continues very large.

Europe is buying much, very much more of our farm products than before the war. I invite your comparison of the exports of beef, pork, corn, and wheat for the years 1913 and 1922:

Confessedly, Europe to-day needs breadstuffs—more breadstuffs than she can buy. She needs half a billion dollars' worth of American wheat and corn. But her economic restoration, the restoration of her buying power, the establishment of true and enduring peace, are blocked at the moment by the bitterness, bad faith, and bickering at Lausanne, the breach of the peace in Memel, the break between Britain and her continental allies, the presence of the battalions of France in the Ruhr. In the old days before the war, Europe was able to buy so largely from us because, despite the burden of armament, she lived in ordered security; her frugal and industrious populations possessed the credit and the tools necessary to trade and commerce; they labored, they produced goods which they exchanged for the fruits of our farms and the manufactures of our mills. During the war, as I have said, the allies bought increasingly—enormously—upon credit, and finally, upon the credit of the Government of the United States. When the war ended and the imperative needs of the reconstruction had been met, above all, when America ceased to sell on credit and without payment, exports to Europe diminished. There was at the same time a deflation of credits in this country. There has been some recovery, but—since it has been neither rapid enough nor great enough to satisfy either the few who would make political capital out of universal economic distress or to relieve the thousands who still suffer from the depression—some men are inveterately tempted to prescribe palatable panaceas for the public ills. This is always so in hard times.

Now there is an assumption by some that they alone are concerned with the economic recovery of Europe and the improvement of prices and trade in America. I want them to make clear precisely what they wish done. We know that Europe wants more cash and credit. We have lent her ten billions since the armistice. She wants more. What other formula is proposed for her relief? Have you forgotten, can you forget, that during the futile and febrile reconsideration of the league covenant by this body it was bruited abroad that in the league was some magic, some abracadabra, some presto list, which would make good the waste of war, imbue limitless issues of paper with vanished values, and continue inflated prices and inflated profits. The league was to be the handmaiden of peace and the harbinger of plenty. The league has proven a poor peace maker or peace keeper. Justice and mercy are still too little known, too little understood, too weak, to carry weight in the councils of Europe, unless they can invoke the aid of forces strong enough to compel for them a reverence and regard which they do not themselves inspire.

We know how perilous is the state of Europe's civilization to-day, how feeble its life. In Russia the fruit of generations of toil has been destroyed, and five times as many have died there under the revolution as died at war under the Czar. If Russia, disordered and despoiled, is able to produce little or nothing to sell abroad, central and southern Europe, west of the Dvina and the Dniester and east of the Isonzo and the Rhine, produces not more than half as much for export as it did before the great conflict.

A part of northern and eastern France was ruthlessly devastated during the conflict; but all central Europe—Poland and Rumania, Yugoslavia and Hungary, no less than Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Germany, were wasted by the war, their fields neglected, their factories and their railways worn and depleted, while since the signing of peace public and private credit in those States has been ruined by inestimable issues of worthless paper. From the Aegean and the Adriatic to the Baltic, Europe has been broken up—Balkanized. Where for the principal purposes of trade there were formerly three, there are now a dozen governments, a dozen tariffs, and a dozen rotten currencies. If the terrible condition of Europe be attributable to the ruin of revolution and the waste of war, it is attributable in part, too, to the increase in the number of States, to their rivalries and ambitions, to the wretched finance, to the incontinent extravagance, and to the unrestrained profligacy of parliaments and governments.

Contrast the retrenchment, the frugality, the economy of the Government of rich and solvent America with the financial frenzies of the bankrupt, or nearly bankrupt, countries of continental Europe. Will some one tell me how they may be led to do as we have done? By what legerdemain they may acquire the ripe experience in self-government and in public finance which we, tried by the Revolution and the great Rebellion, by greenbackery and free silver, have won only through generations? By what charm or what force are they to be led to disarm and to put aside the hates which have animated them for a hundred years? Time, Mr. President, time and labor are the prime requisites for the restoration of Europe. If she will put aside violence and ensue peace, she will help us to save her. Unhappily she must learn by painful failure the road to recovery.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhues, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed without amendment the following bills:

S. 841. An act for the relief of Elizabeth Marsh Watkins;
S. 1945. An act to reimburse the Navajo Timber Co., of Delaware, for a deposit made to cover the purchase of timber;
S. 2210. An act for the relief of Lucy Paradis;
S. 2556. An act for the relief of Edwin Gantner; and
S. 2719. An act to reimburse certain persons for loss of private funds while they were patients at the United States Naval Hospital, Naval Operating Base, Hampton Roads, Va.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1690) to correct the military record of John Sullivan, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message also announced that the House had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 397. An act to remove the charge of desertion against the name of Frank George Bagshaw;

H. R. 855. An act for the relief of Fred G. Leith, United States Navy;

H. R. 2702. An act for the relief of J. W. Glidden and E. F. Hobbs;

H. R. 3499. An act for the relief of the Atlas Lumber Co., Babcock & Wilcox, Johnson, Jackson & Corning Co., and the C. H. Klein Brick Co.;

H. R. 4723. An act for the relief of William M. Phillipson;

H. R. 6204. An act to grant the military target range of Lincoln County, Okla., to the city of Chandler, Okla., and reserving the right to use for military and aviation purposes;

H. R. 6358. An act authorizing the accounting officers of the Treasury to pay to A. E. Ackerman the pay and allowances of his rank for services performed prior to the approval of his bond by the Secretary of the Navy;

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WARREN. I submit the report of the committee of conference on House bill 13926, making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, and I move its adoption.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13926) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24, and agree to the same.

The committee of conference have not agreed upon amendments numbered 10, 25, and 26.

F. E. WARREN,
REED SMOOT,
WM. J. HARRIS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. G. CANNON,
SYDNEY ANDERSON,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. KING. Let me inquire of the Senator what were the items in dispute and will the Senator please state the attitude of the Senate conferees with respect to those items?

Mr. WARREN. There are three items which are matters in agreement, provided the House will accept them. They are items considered to be of a legislative character.

I may say to the Senator from Utah that the bill covers the employees of the Senate and the employees of the House and that in the case of the Senate employees the House conferees receded from their disagreements. In regard to the House employees the Senate made no amendment, so it had no recession to make.

There are three matters of legislation involved. One of them is changing the title of the disbursing officer of the Printing Office to disbursing clerk. Another is as to the allowance of clerks to Senators elect who will come in after March 4. They are allowed clerks during the interim until we meet next fall, putting them on the same basis with Senators who are now Members of the body and who are not chairmen of committees.

The third item is with reference to apprentices in the Printing Office. The former law restricted the number so that there could be but 25 employed at one time. That establishment is asking for more for the reason that they need to have more men instructed in that line of business, and furthermore there are those who have come back from the Army, veterans of the war, whom they would like to employ. So we increased the limit from 25 to 200.

Mr. KING. Is there any change made in the number of clerks that the present Members of the Senate may have during the period of adjournment?

Mr. WARREN. They may have up to four.

Mr. KING. There is no change in existing law?

Mr. WARREN. There is none as to the number of clerks allowed.

The report was agreed to.

H. R. 11528. An act to allow credits in the accounts of certain disbursing officers of the Army of the United States; and

H. R. 11603. An act to validate for certain purposes the revocation of discharge orders of Lieut. Col. James M. Palmer and the orders restoring such officer to his former rank and command; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

H. J. Res. 47. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to receive for instruction at the United States Naval Academy, at Annapolis, Mr. Jose A. de la Torriente, a citizen of Cuba; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on certain amendments of the Senate on House bill 13481, the Agricultural Department appropriation bill, which was read as follows:

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11 to the bill (H. R. 13481) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes," and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert: "and the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, permit timber and other forest products cut or removed from the national forests to be exported from the State or Territory in which said forests are respectively situated."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31 and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert:

"MAXIMUM SALARIES.

"During the fiscal year 1924 the maximum salary of any scientific investigator, or other employee engaged in scientific work and paid from the general appropriations of the Department of Agriculture, shall not exceed at the rate of $6,500 per annum: Provided, That for the fiscal year 1924 no salary shall be paid under this paragraph at a rate per annum in excess of $5,000 except the following: Not more than 12 in excess of $5,000 but not in excess of $5,500 each, and not more than 5 in excess of $5,500 each."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33 and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert:

"FOREST ROADS AND TRAILS.

"For carrying out the provisions of section 23 of the Federal highway act, approved November 9, 1921, $3,000,000, to be available until expended, being part of the sum of $6,500,000 authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, by paragraph 2 of section 4 of the act making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1923, approved June 19, 1922: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized, immediately upon the approval of this act, also to apportion and prorate among the several States, Alaska, and Porto Rico, as provided in section 23 of said Federal highway act, the sum of $3,500,000, constituting the remainder of the said authorization of $6,500,000: Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture may incur obligations, approve projects, or enter into contracts under his apportionment and prorating of this authorization, and his action in so doing shall be deemed a contractual obligation of the Federal Government for the payment of the cost thereof: Provided further, That the appropriations heretofore, herein, and hereafter made for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of section 8 of the act of July 11, 1916, and of section 23 of the Federal highway act of November 9, 1921, and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, shall be considered available for the purpose of discharging the obligations created hereunder in any State or Territory: Provided further, That the total expenditures on account of any State or Territory shall at no time exceed its authorized apportionment."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35 and concur therein with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by said amendment insert "$69,536,653."

That the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 34.

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 11, 31, 33, and 35 and recede from its amendment numbered 34.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Oregon, if his motion shall prevail would that bring the two branches into complete accord on every item of the bill?

Mr. McNARY. Into harmonious accord, I will say to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I would like the Senator to let the matter go over for a little while. Respecting the items with reference to roads, I think a number of Senators would be glad to be advised. If there is nothing pressing, will the Senator consent to bring it up-morrow at 12 o'clock?

Mr. McNARY. I shall be very glad to accommodate the Senator if he desires to look at the item. I think I could explain it in a moment, but if there are other Senators interested—

Mr. KING. There are others who are interested in it and I shall be glad if the Senator will consent to take it up the first thing to-morrow morning.

Mr. McNARY. I shall be glad to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The conference report will go over until to-morrow.

JOHN SULLIVAN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1690) to correct the naval record of John Sullivan, which was to amend the title so as to read, "An act to correct the naval record of John Sullivan."

Mr. MOSES. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATOR FROM MINNESOTA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the credentials of HENRIK SHIPSTEAD, chosen a Senator from the State of Minnesota for the term beginning March 4, 1923, which were read and ordered to be placed on file, as follows:

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
Executive Department, St. Paul.

To the President of the Senate of the United States:

This is to certify that on the 7th day of November, 1922, HENRIK SHIPSTEAD was duly chosen by the qualified electors of the State of Minnesota a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the term of six years, beginning on the 4th day of March, 1923.

Witness his excellency our governor, J. A. O. Preus, and our seal hereto affixed at St. Paul, this 28th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1923.

[SEAL.]

By the governor:

J. A. O. PREUS, Governor.

MIKE HOLM,
Secretary of State.

VIEWS OF HON. STANLEY BALDWIN.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I inquire if there is any other Senator who desires to proceed at this time on the pending bill? I desire to speak about 10 minutes on another subject, and I do not want to interrupt the regular course if some one else wishes to speak on the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Can we not dispose of the Senator's amendment before he proceeds?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not going to discuss the amendment now, but we can take it up immediately after the conclusion of my remarks and dispose of it at that time.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to a very remarkable interview that appeared in Saturday's papers with one Stanley Baldwin, chancellor of the exchequer of Great Britain. On reaching England on the Olympic he gave out this remarkable statement to the papers:

"On the other hand, what the executives in America have to do is to endeavor to force anything of this sort through Congress, and in doing so they may be beaten." Then he continues: "The great difference between America and this country is that settlement of the debt in America is in the hands of politicians. We are bound in regard to that debt in the most stringent bonds you can possibly imagine." Mr. Baldwin described America as "a country, not an urban people. They have men of our way of thinking in the Eastern States," he said, "but that does not cut any ice at all with regard to other parts of America. If you look at the Senate you will find that the majority of the Members come from the agricultural and pastoral communities, and they do not realize the existing position with regard to the meaning of the international debt. The bulk of the people in America have no acquaintance with it. Great Britain lives on international trade, but in America this is not so. The people in the West merely sell wheat and hogs and other products and take no further interest in connection with the international debt or international trade."

And again: "The debt can only be funded on such terms as can be got through Congress, and that is the root of the difficulty with which we are now faced."

Evidently, according to Mr. Baldwin, he had no trouble with the Debt Funding Commission or the administration. It would have been all plain sailing if it had not been for what he evidently looked upon as the ignorant Congress with which he had indirectly to deal.

I need not speak, Mr. President, of the coarseness and uncouthness of these charges against the American Congress and against the American people by a man in high position in Great Britain. I need only say that if he exhibited the same elements of sordid parsimony and uttered the same crude attacks upon the American people and the American Congress while he was here, then the American Debt Funding Commission should not have treated with him at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Senator will recall, while Mr. Baldwin was here the President wrote a scolding letter to the Senate and said if it wanted to be helpful it would give the administration power to deal with the debt question. Evidently the representatives of the British Government knew the administration better than the Senator from Tennessee seems to have known them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; and that is a discouraging and rather shameful feature. After this British commission had had the honors heaped upon it by the administration, such as were heaped upon it while in this country, after our debt-funding commission treated the British commission with such obsequiousness, held its tongue all along the line, kept everything secret, apparently by direction of the British commission, it does seem to me that the head of the British commission when he returned to England owed it to common decency not to have cast these slurs upon the American commission, upon the Congress, and upon the American people.

His indirect attacks upon the funding commission are baser than his attacks upon the American people and the American Congress. He virtually accused the debt-funding commission of being putty in his hands and that he would have had no trouble making any agreement he might have wished if he had only to deal with that commission.

Ah, Mr. President, what a different note did our British friends utter toward the American Congress in May, 1917, when they came over here to borrow this very money in order to save their nation and, as they claimed, in order to save civilization! I quote from the speech of their spokesman, Mr. Balfour, in this body on May 8, 1917. Said Mr. Balfour:

The object of our mission, if I may so express it, was mainly a purely business one. We came here to discuss matters of the deepest moment for the conduct of that Great War in which both our nations are involved.

In other words, they came here to get money in order to conduct that war.

We came here to explain to your leaders and statesmen what were the needs from which the Allies mainly suffered and to lay freely at the disposal of those responsible for the conduct of your affairs, the results of our own experience, the consequences, perhaps I ought to say, of our own errors and blunders during two years and a half of strenuous and sanguinary fight. That was the original object. That was the business side of our mission. But the reception we have received from the President, from the Cabinet, from the House of Representatives, from the Senate—that treatment raises the whole level of our mission from a purely business operation to a great incident in the common life of two great and free peoples.

That address is reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the year 1917, on page 1943, and was delivered in the presence of the Senate and of all the British mission. They all adopted and ratified the words of Mr. Balfour then. Oh, yes, Mr. President, when they came for this money in this Chamber and in the Chamber at the other end of the Capitol they lauded to the skies the representatives of the people upon whom this man, when he comes to fix the terms for the settlement of the indebtedness, casts reproaches and reflections upon all Members of the House and Senate, except as to those who come from New York and the East. Unless this man is an ass, he knew that this money had been borrowed by his Government from the Congress and that the Congress was the only authority which had power to deal with it. He knew that. Yet he assails Congress in this coarse fashion.

On May 5, 1917, that same borrowing mission, with that spokesman, Mr. Balfour, visited the House of Representatives, and here is what he had to say about the United States when the mission wanted the Congress to lend them this money. I quote from Mr. Balfour's speech in the House of Representatives:

Ladies and gentlemen, these two assemblies are the greatest and oldest of the free assemblies now governing great nations of the world. The history, indeed, of the two is very different. The beginnings of the British House of Commons go back to a dim historic past, and its full rights and status have only been conquered and permanently secured after centuries of political struggle. Your fate has been a happier one. You were called into existence at a much later stage of social development. You came into being complete and perfected and all your powers determined and your place in the Constitution secured beyond chance of revolution; but, though the history of these two great assemblies are different, each of them represents the great democratic principle to which we look forward as the security of the future peace of the world. [Applause.] All of the free assemblies now to be found governing the great nations of the earth have been modeled either upon your practice or upon ours, or upon both combined. Mr. Speaker, the compliment paid to the nation of Great Britain by such an assembly and upon such an occasion is one that not one of us is ever likely to forget. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 66th Cong., 2d sess., p. 1879.)

And yet, when the British commission come back to fix the terms for the payment of the very money which they had borrowed, they forget there was a Congress at all, they forget that there was a Senate, except to slur at it, and they never even mention the House of Representatives. Yes, Mr. President, when our British friends wanted to borrow the $4,700,000,000 from us, they went before both branches of the Congress, with compliments and flattery, with expressions of good will, with sentiments of esteem and respect, with gratitude, which they said they would never forget, and yet, when pay-day comes around, they send another commission over here that deals in the dark. They even, apparently, requested the American commission not to have anything to say about what is going on. They never came even near either branch of Congress, and then the head of it goes back and tells the British people that they could have made a deal for the payment of these debts to their own liking if it had not been for the uninformed and purely political Congress that held the American commission back and prevented the British commission from getting what it desired in the way of a settlement.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I again interrupt the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. How does the Senator from Tennessee know that Mr. Baldwin was not telling the exact truth when he said that he could get any terms he wanted from this administration if Congress would not interfere?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, Mr. President, I feel that surely no American citizen, whether he be a Democrat or a Republican, whether he be identified with this administration or not, could be base enough to have dealt with this British commission in the way that this interview implies. I would much prefer not to believe that.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator from Tennessee know what terms actually were discussed?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; and that is what I am coming to right now.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then why does the Senator, who does know what took place, characterize as improper the statement of Mr. Baldwin?

Mr. McKELLAR. We are going to learn something about it; and I am going to discuss now the very question which the Senator brings up.

Mr. President, I do not know what defense members of the American Debt Funding Commission are going to make to the slurs and innuendoes cast upon them by this representative of the British Government.

I am sure that Mr. Baldwin's statement that western Senators and western Representatives and western people are ignorant of international affairs and finance is quite untrue. The Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot], who is a member of the American commission, is probably as well versed in international finance and business as is Mr. Baldwin. Representative BURTON, who formerly was a Member of this body, also is an authority on international finance and business matters. Together they are the representatives of the American Congress with whom Mr. Baldwin has been most closely associated while he was here. Mr. Baldwin's statement, therefore, appears to me to be an unwarranted criticism of these two distinguished gentlemen.

I digress here long enough to say that if it is an unwarranted criticism of them, it is the duty of those two representatives on the commission to speak out to the American people and tell them what are the facts. This man Baldwin, who has gone back to England, has virtually stated that the American commission was putty in his hands and would have agreed to anything that he asked if it had not been for fear of the Congress. It is their duty to speak out like American citizens, and I believe they will speak out. If they were not putty in his hands they should speak out. I am sorry the Senator from Utah is not present while I am making this statement. I am sure he would denounce the statements of Baldwin.

I have taken the position heretofore that these gentlemen and the other members of the American commission were at fault in not taking the American people into their confidence. I have thought, and still think, the American commission should have disclosed what was going on. I have denounced the policy of secrecy from the very inception of the secret meetings between the two commissions. It ought never to have been indulged in. Open, fair, above-board, frank statements should have been published at the time, and the American people should have been told all about what was going on in connection with this enormous debt which these two commissions were apparently trying to fund. If our commission had disclosed what was going on to the American people, if they had taken the American people into their confidence, they would not have subjected themselves to what I think the wholly unwarranted reflection that has been made upon them by this representative of the British people.

Mr. Baldwin's statement that a majority of Senators were from agricultural and pastoral communities, while technically true, is an attempted clumsy effort on his part to cast odium upon western Senators. His statement that "the people of the West merely sell wheat and hogs"—and I ask the representatives of Western States to consider this remark—and do not think of or know anything else, is simply a disgusting attempt at wit and a shining display of ignorance. If western Senators will not defend their own people somebody ought to do so when they are thus maligned and abused. I call upon the Senators representing the West to defend their own people against these aspersions made by the coarse and uncouth and ill-bred Baldwin.

Mr. President, I am glad that no Democrat was put on that commission and that the party to which I belong does not have to bear the odium of any part of the slurring statements made by the head of the British commission. That partisan commission, instead of being criticized by Baldwin, should have been praised by him, for it seems to have been all the time under the influence of the British commission in so far as secrecy, at least, was concerned. Our commission declined even to state the terms of the proposals, although asked to do so nearly every day by me, and we know of the terms only through the head of the British mission. The terms which, it is claimed, the American commission offered are violative of the expressed will and determination of the Congress as declared by law, and other proposals should not have been made by our commission. If there had been open, fair dealing, public dealing, instead of secret dealing such as took place, they would not have been made.

Mr. President, I do not know what position the administration is going to take on this subject, but I know what it ought to do. It should make immediate demand upon the British Government to disavow the statements of the chancellor of the exchequer, casting aspersions upon the American Senate and the American House of Representatives and upon the American people, and lastly upon the American Debt Funding Commission—I am going to take up for our funding commission, too. The British Government should disavow those statements absolutely. I can not believe that the British people entertain the view that Mr. Baldwin expresses in reference to the funding of these debts. The British people have always been a debt-paying people. They have not treated their obligations as a "scrap of paper"; and it is inconceivable to me that these self-respecting people, these contract-observing people, will permit one of their own number to utter these uncalled-for, untrue, and discourteous words toward the American people and the American representatives without rebuke, in view of all the wonderful acts of friendship that have so frequently characterized the American people in their attitude toward the British Government and the British people.

Mr. President, I want also to call attention to the statement that appears in this morning's Washington Post that the British people are very much disappointed over the failure of their debt commission to secure payment of the American indebtedness in pounds rather than in dollars. If the American Debt Funding Commission had for a moment permitted a suggestion of such a repayment to be made, it would have done this country the greatest wrong. The British Government did not borrow this money in pounds. If it had, there would have been a very different and a very much larger sum that it owed. It borrowed the money in dollars, and to pay it in pounds would have been little less than a "skin game."

Again, Mr. President, quoting from the London article in the Post, it is said:

It is clearly evident from statements published here during the week end—

This is a London article—that the British Government had anticipated being able to fund the debt on an interest basis nearer 2 per cent than 3 per cent, or £20,000,000 annually. According to these statements an informal promise was made by two prominent American diplomats at a luncheon party given at No. 10 Downing Street, the British Prime Minister's official residence, last summer, that the funding would be carried out on that basis. It is asserted that Mr. Bonar Law was present at this luncheon.

The American diplomats were not named, but they are said to have been of "the highest standing."

Mr. President, who were these American diplomats that made any such statement? They ought to be named. The State Department ought to give us the names of such diplomats, and they ought to be recalled at once.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. McKELLAR. In just one second. It was a matter that they were not privileged to speak about. If they knew anything, they knew that this whole debt-settlement matter was in the hands of the Congress, and not in the hands of our diplomatic corps. Where is the great Ambassador Harvey? Why does not he raise his voice in behalf of his Government and the American people at this time? Has he lost his voice permanently? He never seems to be on hand when something real is going on.

I now yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator from Tennessee now says, "Where was Harvey?" The Senator must know that he was not referred to, because the article says it was a diplomat of high standing.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am not going to discuss the ambassador to England at this time; but I do say, in conclusion, that after these little-short-of-infamous statements having been made by this man Baldwin, representative of the British Government, President Harding owes it to the people of this country to demand an apology from Great Britain for this man's uncouth and coarse language. What we ought to do is another thing. Our terms, given by Congress for the refunding of this debt, were openly discussed, openly voted for, and openly passed. They are just and equitable and ought not to be changed. The British Debt Funding Commission knew these terms when they came here. Our Debt Funding Commission knew the terms. They had voted for them. They knew exactly what Congress had authorized them to do. Our Debt Funding Commission, it now appears—not from anything they have told us, for they have been as silent as the grave, but purely upon word received from Mr. Baldwin after he got back to London—have made an offer contrary to the terms which they were instructed to ask. They owe us an explanation, too. They ought to come forward here and give us the facts. Let them speak out. There is one representative of that commission who is a Member of this body and another one a Member of the House of Representatives. They owe it to themselves, they owe it to their party, they owe it to the American people, to come forward and state the facts, and resent or refute the vulgar, the outrageous, and disgusting statements that have been made by one Stanley Baldwin.

I have just been handed an afternoon paper showing that Harvey, as is usual with him, has put his foot into it again. He has come out for Baldwin. America has, indeed, fallen into impious hands. I quote Harvey's bray. This one bray is sufficient ground for recalling him immediately. I quote the dispatch:

HARVEY IS WELL SATISFIED.

LONDON.—George Harvey, American ambassador to Great Britain arrived at Plymouth to-day, and declared in an interview that Stanley Baldwin, head of Britain's debt funding commission, had made an excellent impression in the United States and that the results of the mission would be good.

RURAL-CREDIT FACILITIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States, to amend the Federal farm loan act, to amend the Federal reserve act, and for other purposes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I understand that the vote will come now on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). That is correct.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I want to make a statement to the Senate in reference to it. It will be very short.

My amendment is that section 13 of the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913, as amended, be amended by adding after the words "being eligible for discount" and before the words "but such definition shall not include" the words—

And the notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors making advances exclusively to producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state shall be eligible for such discount.

Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is very simple. When the Federal reserve act was passed in 1913 it was assumed by everybody that what is known as factors' paper was eligible for rediscount in the reserve banks. For five years after the passage of that amendment such paper was rediscounted in the various Federal reserve banks.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. Will not the Senator describe that factors' paper?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall do so. I intended to do so and shall do so right away. In 1918 a ruling was had, I suppose by the counsel of the Federal Reserve Board, though I am not advised as to that—it was perhaps by the board itself, probably on the advice of counsel, of course—that such paper was not eligible to rediscount. I want to explain the factor's business as we have it in my State.

We will take a cotton factor. A cotton factor in the spring of the year makes a contract with a producer of cotton to lend him the money with which to make his crop, taking from him an agreement to ship him so many bales of cotton, depending on the amount of money loaned, in the fall of the year. The factor really furnishes the bulk, I might say, of the money on which cotton crops are raised in my section, and to a very large extent raised in the whole South. It is a very large business, and there are many factors. He furnishes the money to begin the crop even before it is planted, sometimes to buy the seed, then to work the crop, and then to harvest the crop, to pick it—which is rather an expensive operation—to haul it, to gin it, to market it; and then, in the fall of the year, when the crop is marketed and sold, the cotton factor repays himself and accounts to his principal for all of it, of course.

Mr. President, that custom has grown up, not for a few years, but ever since the cotton business started in the South there have been, as I am reliably informed, cotton factors and commission merchants. In my own city, some of the strongest firms that exist there are cotton factors—firms like Dillard & Coffin, Sledge & Norfleet, W. A. Gage & Co., and a great number of others that I could name. There are a great many there, firms of the highest standing, and whose paper is good; yet, because they are cotton factors, just simply because they are cotton factors and handle their business in that way, their paper is not eligible for rediscount in the various banks.

Mr. LENROOT. What kind of paper is it? That is the information I wanted to get.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is their paper.

Mr. LENROOT. Their own personal paper?

Mr. McKELLAR. Their own personal paper; and some of it, quite a large amount of it, has the warehouse receipts attached as security for the paper.

Mr. McLEAN. Warehouse receipts for what?

Mr. McKELLAR. For the cotton.

Mr. McLEAN. When it is not grown?

Mr. McKELLAR. They take the warehouse receipts in the fall of the year, when the cotton begins to come in, in order to get additional supplies. It takes an immense amount of money to handle a cotton crop. Of course, they can not take warehouse receipts in the spring of the year. They get the warehouse receipts only after the cotton is shipped to the city and put in a warehouse and insured. It is the very best and highest security that can be had. I take it that the banks of my city would say that the very best security they have is the paper of a cotton factor with warehouse receipts attached.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. May a man be a factor and at the same time a dealer or owner upon his own account?

Mr. McKELLAR. Occasionally that occurs, but as a rule these great factors handle the crops of other people. They lend the money to make the crops, as I have stated, to harvest the crops, and then in the fall of the year they apply the proceeds of the cotton when sold; and there is quite a distinction, I will say, between a cotton buyer and a cotton factor. A cotton factor is a man who handles it in the way that I have described. A cotton buyer buys either for himself or for mills or for foreign spindles.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SWANSON. The same difficulty arises also in the city of Norfolk, where they do not make advances to raise cotton in the shape of supplies, but a factor desires to get, say, 10,000 bales of cotton before getting a ship to carry it to Liverpool, Hamburg, or other places. In the meantime he advances the freight charges to the farmer who raises this cotton, and some money to pay his debts at home, and that paper was eligible for discount until two years ago. At that time the ruling was reversed, and that really destroyed, to a large extent, the export cotton business in Norfolk and other places where that system of business was conducted. A man can not ship cotton to Norfolk, New Orleans, or Galveston and transport it by ship until he accumulates enough cotton to load the ship. When they get five or ten or fifteen thousand bales they have enough to load the ship and it is exported. The paper that the factors had for that purpose was eligible for discount with the Federal reserve system until about two years ago. The bankers in Norfolk wanted that condition to continue. They were willing to discount the paper in Norfolk, provided the Federal reserve system would discount the paper in Richmond. I appeared before the Federal Reserve Board and also before their attorney, and I think it was a very forced construction of the law to hold that that paper was not eligible. It really injured to a large extent the export cotton business in the seaports where cotton is accumulated and afterwards exported.

Mr. NORRIS. From the explanation which has been made it seems to me that the question is reduced to this, that these money lenders, whom the Senators call factors, constitute, in reality, middlemen between the banker and the grower. They loan the money to the man who wants to produce the cotton, then they go to the bank and discount their note and get some more money, which they loan to somebody else, and discount that again. Is that the operation?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the operation in the fall of the year. The Senator must make a distinction between the fall and the spring. The factors lend their own money in the spring of the year to make the crop, and frequently to harvest it; but it is a very expensive thing to make and harvest a crop of cotton, and especially to harvest it. The picking costs from $10 to $15 a bale; the ginning costs several dollars a bale; the hauling and the bagging and tying cost a great deal, and they all have to be paid for. The result is that there are few factors who could do a profitable business if they depended entirely on their own financing. In the fall of the year they have to aid in this process by using cotton warehouse receipts, borrowing money from the banks.

Mr. NORRIS. The question arises in my mind, why not eliminate these factors, and let the man who produces the cotton borrow the money in the first instance from the bank, and save one commission? As I understand the operation of it, the bank, after all, furnishes the money. Why do they need this intermediary, who must of necessity charge for his services?

Mr. McKELLAR. It may be remedied in some subsequent acts, or it may be remedied to some extent by this bill, but as a matter of fact, the banks sometimes lend the farmers money in the spring of the year, before the crop is even planted, oftentimes the notes to run until the fall of the year. That paper is not what is called bankable paper, and in order to get the money the farmer must utilize the means I have indicated.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, in that case, the operation of it would mean what is not bankable paper becomes bankable paper by the interposition of the middleman.

Mr. McKELLAR. No.

Mr. NORRIS. Then how is it that the factor, the middleman, by loaning money to the farmers to put in a crop, can discount his note at the bank, and that note then becomes eligible for rediscount by the bank with the Federal reserve bank?

Mr. McKELLAR. Under a ruling of the Federal Reserve Board they will not permit that.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand. Why should they permit it for the middleman and not permit it for the farmer himself?

Mr. McLEAN. They do permit it for the farmer.

Mr. SWANSON. They will lend the farmer money to produce a crop, but they will not lend him money to hold long enough to distribute the crop.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that; but, as I understand, the amendment will have the effect of getting around that proposition by letting the middleman carry on the business. This amendment would make that paper eligible.

Mr. SWANSON. Not entirely for the middleman.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me that is putting on the business a burden it ought to escape.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand the present law, you can take a farmer's note for money to be used to produce a crop and have it discounted by a bank, which can then have it discounted by the Federal reserve system.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true.

Mr. SWANSON. If the farmer wants to sell his crop abroad, distribute it, his note will not be discounted. That is true, is it not?

Mr. McLEAN. If the note is secured by the cotton, the farmer can get all the accommodation he wants.

Mr. SWANSON. Nearly half the cotton produced is sold by factors. A producer can not ship his cotton until he has accumulated enough at the seaport to fill a ship. Very frequently I go and ask that a ship be sent to Norfolk or to Newport News, because cotton has accumulated there. To accumulate that cotton and fill a ship the factors must pay the freight, they must pay the storage, and they simply do a commission business. They enable the farmers to do their own exporting to Liverpool, Hamburg, and these other places, and it is sold on commission. It is not a case of a middleman buying it and making a profit. It is sold by the middleman as the agent of the producers. That paper had been held to be eligible until two years ago. The trouble happened in Norfolk, when the factors went to the banks, and the banks said, "We can not take your paper as we have done heretofore. We can not rediscount it in Richmond at the Federal reserve bank." I appeared before the Federal Reserve Board and tried to get them to continue the ruling which had theretofore existed making that paper eligible. A ruling was made that that class of paper was not eligible for rediscount; and this amendment is proposed to make that paper eligible in the Federal reserve banks, because nearly one-half of the cotton is sold in that way.

Those who handle the cotton in the way I have indicated are the people who are benefited under this, in addition to the producers.

Mr. NORRIS. That is a different class from the one the Senator from Tennessee has been discussing.

Mr. SWANSON. This will help both classes.

Mr. NORRIS. There is a question in my mind as to whether there ought to be any help to the one class. In other words, if you are not going to permit the farmer who wants to plant cotton to have his note held eligible you should not make it eligible by interposing a middleman and adding that much more to the interest in order to do it.

Mr. McKELLAR. But the middleman ought to have a right to have his paper rediscounted if he desires. Just simply because he happens to be in the business of a cotton factor the benefits of the reserve system should not be denied him if his paper is otherwise good.

I call attention to what the department has said about it. I will read a letter from the chairman of the Federal Reserve Board:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Washington, May 9, 1921.

HON. KENNETH McKELLAR,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR McKELLAR: I have your letter of the 7th instant, inclosing copy of Senate bill No. 1615, introduced by you. I have received a letter from Chairman McLEAN, of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, asking for the views of the board on this bill, and I am inclosing for your information copy of a letter which I have been directed to send to Senator McLEAN regarding it, such direction being by unanimous vote of the six members of the board present at the meeting to-day.

Very truly yours,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

Again, on May 9:

HON. GEORGE P. McLEAN,
Chairman Committee on Banking and Currency,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MAY 9, 1921.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I have received your letter of May 6, in which you request the views of the Federal Reserve Board with regard to Senate bill 1615, the purpose of which is to amend section 13 of the Federal reserve act by inserting a provision to the effect that "the notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors dealing exclusively with producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state shall be eligible for discount."

The board desires to point out that in its judgment the phraseology of the proposed insertion would be improved if the words "making advances" were substituted for the word "dealing," in the seventh line of the bill, and the word "to" were substituted for the word "with" in the eighth line, so that the insertion would read "and the notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors making advances exclusively to producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state shall be eligible for such discount."

That is exactly the way I have it. I stop here long enough to say that the Federal Reserve Board wrote the very amendment that is offered here. It is exactly the same as the one they proposed. There is not the change of a word or a syllable. Mr. Harding continues:

In my letter to you of December 19, 1920, expressing the board's views with regard to Senate bill 4537, which was intended to make eligible for rediscount the paper of cotton factors and commission merchants, it was pointed out that the paper was finance paper, rather than commercial or agricultural paper, since the borrower used the proceeds to make loans to his customers. The bill now under consideration—Senate bill 1615—is open to the same objection upon principle, but in view of the narrow scope of the bill under its restricted language, the Federal Reserve Board will offer no objection to it if amended as herein suggested.

Yours very truly,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

Again:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, May 10, 1921.

HON. KENNETH McKELLAR,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am writing to acknowledge your note of the 7th instant inclosing copy of your bill (S. 1615) to amend the Federal reserve act so as to make factors' paper eligible for discount by Federal reserve banks. In order to relieve the amendment of any ambiguity, I have suggested a slight change in the phrasing, which commended itself to Governor Harding and other members of the board, to wit, the substitution of the phrase "making advances exclusively to" in place of "dealing exclusively with." In this form I believe the amendment is as unobjectionable as it could be made, consistent with the object aimed at. Believe me,

Very sincerely yours,

A. C. MILLER.

There is another letter here which I should have read, but I have not. It is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, May 9, 1921.

HON. KENNETH McKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I received your letter of May 7, 1921, inclosing a copy of S. 1615, a bill to amend section 13 of the Federal reserve act in respect to the notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors dealing exclusively with producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state. The Treasury does not offer any objection to the bill in this form.

Very truly yours,

A. W. MELLON.

This has been approved by both the Federal Reserve Board and the Treasury Department. It is an amendment that is very much needed among the producers of crops down in my section of the country, and in addition to that it is very much needed by these gentlemen who are denied without cause the right to rediscount their paper, and I hope very sincerely there will be no objection offered to the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator has stated that factors sometimes are owners and dealers in a commodity as well as making advances to the producers of the commodity.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is only occasionally.

Mr. LENROOT. In any event under the language of the amendment as it stands the paper that may be discounted or made eligible to discount is not paper the proceeds of which have been used to produce or market a crop. It may have been pure speculation upon the part of the factor, and the Senator is in terms making purely speculative paper eligible for discount.

Mr. McKELLAR. That very matter was discussed at great length by the Federal Reserve Board. Those gentlemen went into it very carefully. The amendment was prepared by members of the Federal Reserve Board and I accepted just what they prepared.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. McKELLAR. In just a moment. The amendment does not have the vice to which the Senator refers.

Mr. LENROOT. Why does it not?

Mr. McKELLAR. They say not.

Mr. LENROOT. But the Senator is a good lawyer and can construe language.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think it has that vice.

Mr. SWANSON. If the factor engages in speculation, he is not engaged exclusively in making advances to producers.

Mr. LENROOT. He may not be making advances to anybody except producers, but he may be dealing upon his own account, and as the language reads it seems clear to me it is simply pointing out a class of persons whose paper may be eligible for discount.

Mr. McKELLAR. I call the Senator's attention to the language:

The notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors making advances exclusively to producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state.

There can not be any misapprehension.

Mr. LENROOT. But that is not the Senator's amendment. It has been changed.

Mr. FLETCHER. That was modified by changing it to read "making advances exclusively."

Mr. LENROOT. They might not make advances to individuals, but they might on their own account and become speculators wholly, and yet the paper would become eligible to discount.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is not intended at all.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not question that.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the minute the factor becomes the owner of the property himself he ceases to be a factor. Under the language only a factor engaged in factoring may be advanced money.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator mean he may not get goods in his own name and his paper be eligible to discount?

Mr. GEORGE. He may own goods in his own name and deal with his own goods, but credit based upon that paper would not come within his operations as a factor. In his individual capacity he may own goods and may deal with them, but he is then not factoring and is not engaged in factoring.

Mr. SWANSON. It is not then the note of a factor.

Mr. GEORGE. No. In the business of factoring the factor or commission merchant has a status well recognized and well defined in the law of all our Southern States. He does business upon a security authorized by law. His bills and notes are secured by a form of security recognized by law. The old-fashioned factor has practically ceased to exist in my State; that is, the factor who was in some sections a supply merchant or a banker advancing money to make the crop.

The factor now is chiefly valuable because he collects the product after it is put in merchantable form and holds it until he is able to make shipment. He is largely a warehouseman as well as a factor, and yet his business of factoring is well recognized in our States, and in my State, I know, it is especially defined and protected. While he might buy products of his own, he would not then be a factor. He would be then a cotton buyer, and the paper based upon that transaction would not be eligible to discount under the Federal reserve system.

Mr. LENROOT. His general business might be called a factor.

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly, but it would not be an advance made, and his paper, based upon the language of the amendment now under consideration, would not be eligible to discount under the Federal reserve system.

Mr. LENROOT. That is the question.

Mr. GEORGE. He might be a banker and also be a farmer, and he might engage in some other business, but that paper would not be eligible under the provision.

Mr. LENROOT. Taking the Senator's own illustration, if the language read "banker" instead of "factor," would he say the language would not authorize the discounting of all paper the banker might offer, irrespective of its character?

Mr. GEORGE. Only the paper that he had accumulated in making advances exclusively to producers.

Mr. LENROOT. No; it would point out a class of bankers who would be entitled to the privileges of discount, but it would not apply solely to the business, and that is my whole point. It should be confined, if it goes in at all, to paper issued by factors as such.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator from Wisconsin want to add the words "as such"? I would accept that modification.

Mr. GEORGE. I merely wish to make the further observation that the factor himself is not usually a buyer of the product. The two are inconsistent. He can not act as agent and at the same time be a buyer on his own account.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not think there is any doubt that the Senate does not want to enact a law which would give a pure speculator any privilege with reference to discounts.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator misunderstands the business of factoring.

Mr. LENROOT. I have had the definitions and carefully gone over them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator let me make this suggestion? In line 6, after the word "exclusively," how would it do to add the words "as factors"? Would that meet the suggestion which the Senator from Wisconsin makes?

Mr. SWANSON. "As such" would do it.

Mr. LENROOT. "Issued as such" might do it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent to perfect my amendment in line 5, after the word "factors," by inserting the words "issued as such."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has a right to perfect his own amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I suggest, if the Senator will allow me, that what seemed the trouble with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was, as he explained, that he could not see why the farmer could not go to a bank and get the banker to make the advance; in other words, that the factor was an unnecessary middleman and more or less of a burden upon the producer. That is not the situation now with reference to factors in connection with the business. The factor affords an additional facility and his operation is a benefit to the producer.

The banker would not take the farmer's paper where he has cotton, for instance, in the field that is matured and ripened and ready to be picked, but the factor is interested in the business and has perhaps made an advance already for fertilizer. He knows exactly how many acres are under cultivation. He watches the crop. He knows how much it is going to produce per acre. He goes out and looks at it and sees for himself what the condition of the cotton is. He makes advances for the purpose of gathering the cotton, ginning it, and preparing it for market. He takes that risk which the banker would not take because the banker can not keep up with the crop from time to time in its different changing conditions from the planting of the crop to its final gathering, harvesting, and baling for market. But the factor does that and therefore it seems to me his paper, bearing his indorsement, he being personally liable on it and having secured himself, would be perfectly good paper.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask for a vote on my amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Not quite yet.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not mean to hurry the Senate to a vote if the Senator from Nebraska desires to occupy the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. I shall not detain the Senate long. I am still not satisfied, as I understand the situation. I realize that it is a business with which I am not familiar and I apologize for my ignorance, but the Senate stands now converted by the letter which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has read from W. P. G. Harding, who is the head of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. HEFLIN. Who was the head.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; who was the head. He wrote this letter while he was its head. I have listened very intently on many occasions to the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] in regard to this person. I think he has convinced the Senate, the President, and the country—I think he said as much one day—that the word of this man Harding was no good and should never be taken, and yet here has come the Senator from Tennessee and practically won over the entire Senate to make eligible a lot of paper for the benefit of the middleman and to put the burden upon the man who produces the cotton, as I understand it. I have wondered whether the Senator from Alabama was going to permit that to be done.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Senator from Nebraska will permit me, I think at the time the then governor of the Federal Reserve Board wrote a letter to the Senator from Tennessee, he was feeling considerably the lash we were applying to him up here and was trying to court favor somewhat in order to hold his position. I have just as little confidence now in anything suggested by him as I had then, but when a man is trying to hold his place and works as hard for it as he did, he is liable to state some truth among the things he says.

Mr. NORRIS. If that is true, and this man by the lashing, as the Senator said, was whipped into a mood of ability and honesty, then while he was in that mood we ought to have kept him in the job. He ought to be given a place for life, because the Senator from Alabama announced the other day he was going to stay here for life—

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, no; I did not say for life.

Mr. NORRIS. And continue to pound away at him.

Mr. HEFLIN. I said I expected to be here for some time.

Mr. NORRIS. At any rate, the Senator expected to continue to talk about Harding, and yet he seems to have been converted to accepting his word.

Mr. LENROOT. I think the Senator from Nebraska has misunderstood the Senator from Alabama. I do not understand the Senator from Alabama means to convey the thought that he thinks that "William Poison Gas Harding," as he terms him, has told the truth even now, but he wrote the letter only to catch southern votes.

Mr. NORRIS. But he has not any votes to catch.

Mr. HEFLIN. He catches anything that might come his way.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me he is catching even the junior Senator from Alabama.

Mr. CARAWAY. He is a better catcher than the Senator from Nebraska thought.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I never thought for a moment he would be able to catch the junior Senator from Alabama in his lasso, but he seems to have gotten him on this occasion.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to say just a word to the Senator from Nebraska, a factor really helps the producer of cotton. For instance, a farmer can not ship his cotton to Liverpool. He is bound to rely upon somebody who collects enough cotton to fill a ship, and when he does that, it is sold for his account.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not controverting that point. It seems to me there is one view that may be taken of the amendment that would demonstrate its worthiness. From all the Senator from Virginia has said, and I have listened to all the debate on it, the factor performs a valuable service in gathering in the cotton and holding it until he gets a shipload and until it can be sold. That is a good service.

Mr. SWANSON. It is sold, then, for the producer's account, and that enables the producer to sell his cotton himself in Liverpool instead of being compelled to sell it to a speculator. The cotton farmers, through a factor, accumulate a shipload and sell it in Liverpool and get the profits themselves, less the commission.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; less the commission and the interest they pay. That is a good service; but we have been told, and I take it that is one of the objects of the paper, that the factors loan to the farmers money to buy fertilizer to take care of the crop and then to harvest it. He puts up the money before the cotton is planted. That is a different kind of service from gathering cotton together and holding it and accumulating it until they can get enough to make a shipload. The paper of the man who plants the cotton—the farmer himself, whom we all love so much and whom we are all working very hard to please and to help, the real farmer who plants the cotton—would not be eligible if he borrowed that same money from the bank to buy fertilizer and plant the cotton, as I understand it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, it would be eligible then, being for agricultural purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. Would that be eligible under the Senator's amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendment does not interfere with that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. If that be true, my principal objection, which it seemed to me existed, has disappeared.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think there can be any question in the world about the farmers' paper.

Mr. NORRIS. The point I wanted to make was that I did not want to make paper eligible simply because a middleman had come in and indorsed it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand the amendment will not affect that particular feature.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is simply in addition to that.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that the cotton factors live mainly in the neighborhood of seaport towns, such as Norfolk, Savannah, Augusta, Mobile, New Orleans, Memphis, and so forth. For instance, a farmer who is going to make 50 bales of cotton will go to one of the factors and say, "I want to get money from you now, and I will deliver 50 bales of cotton in the fall." He contracts with the factor to that effect, and the factor then lends him the money. Perhaps the factor needs money himself later on for some other purpose, and so he goes over to the bank, indorses the farmer's paper, and gets the money. I think it will be helpful to those who deal in cotton.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Alabama that the man who makes advances to the farmer to produce a crop stands in the attitude of a commission merchant; that does not constitute him a cotton factor. The factor is a man who takes the finished product for somebody and sells it.

Mr. HEFLIN. The factors do let them have money, in order to bring their cotton direct to them to enable them to ship it abroad. There is some of that done.

Mr. CARAWAY. Such a man is not going to be affected under the amendment, because that class of his business will be cut out.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not understand the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator from Alabama says that the man he is trying to reach is the man who loans money to the farmer to make the crop. Such a business does not constitute a man a factor. The factor is the man who handles the product for the farmer as his agent and sells it.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator means after it is produced?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; the man who handles the product at any time; and this amendment will never reach the man the Senator from Alabama describes as the man who advances the money to the farmer.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand the Senator's idea.

Mr. HEFLIN. That man ought to be reached under it.

Mr. CARAWAY. But he will not be reached under the amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. We thought it would reach him.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand, the contention of the Senator from Arkansas is that this amendment would not apply to a man, no matter what you call him, whether factor or anything else, who loans money to the farmer to plant and grow cotton?

Mr. CARAWAY. This amendment does not reach that class of individuals.

Mr. NORRIS. That is because of the word "factor" being used, I presume.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; and the words "as such." Only in his capacity as a factor can his paper be discounted under this amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that.

Mr. CARAWAY. Because it uses the words "as such," and the transaction of lending money to a farmer to enable him to make a crop is not a factor's business "as such," but his sole duty is to handle the product as the agent of the producer and sell it for him. If that is the kind of individual it is proposed to embrace under the amendment, it will not accomplish the purpose intended.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if no one else desires to speak on the amendment, I hope we may have a vote this afternoon.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the undeniable fact is that these are what are known as finance bills, which, as a general proposition, are not eligible for rediscount at a Federal reserve bank. It has been so decided by the counsel for the Federal Reserve Board after very careful examination into the matter, and he has set forth his views in a very exhaustive opinion. However, the amendment so hedges the proposition about as to make it not very dangerous; in fact, the governor of the Federal Reserve Board said to me that such paper in the rediscount operations of the Federal reserve system was so absolutely inconsequential that the board thought it entirely secure and safe, with the amendment as drafted by the board, to admit it to rediscount.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope we may now have a vote on my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to, as follows:

SEC. 12. That section 13 of the Federal reserve act, as amended, be further amended by adding, after the words "being eligible for discount" and before the words "but such definition shall not include," the words: "And the notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors issued as such making advances exclusively to producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state shall be eligible for such discount."

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I desire to offer the amendment which I sent to the Secretary's desk earlier in the day, so that it may be pending when the Senate reconvenes tomorrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 13. That the act approved April 13, 1920, being Public, No. 170, Sixty-sixth Congress, entitled "An act to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LENROOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE SHERMAN E. BURROUGHS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. SHERMAN E. BURROUGHS, late a Representative from the State of New Hampshire, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

Mr. MOSES. I ask that the resolutions of the House be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The reading clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 29, 1923.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. SHERMAN E. BURROUGHS, a Representative from the State of New Hampshire.

Resolved, That a committee of 12 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk and ask for their adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 425) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. SHERMAN E. BURROUGHS, late a Representative from the State of New Hampshire.

Resolved, That a committee of six Senators be appointed by the Vice President, to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to attend the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The VICE PRESIDENT, under the second resolution, appointed Mr. MOSES, Mr. KEYES, Mr. HARRELD, Mr. MCKINLEY, Mr. BAYARD, and Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts members of the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative, I move that the Senate take a recess under the order previously entered.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously made, took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 30, 1923, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 29, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Heavenly Father, suffer us to come to Thee. Be with all afflicted ones and comfort them with that peace that is blended with the very harmonies of heaven. Hear us as we pray: "Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them who trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen."

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

DEATH OF HON. SHERMAN E. BURROUGHS.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Speaker, after a brief illness, Hon. SHERMAN E. BURROUGHS, a Representative in Congress from the first district of New Hampshire, died in Washington, D. C., late in the evening of Saturday, the 27th day of this month. It is with profound sorrow and grief that I make this announcement. In his death I keenly realize his loss as a colleague, as a legislator, and a true friend. Later a request will be made that a time be set apart for the purpose of allowing his colleagues to express their appreciation of his services to our beloved country.

I offer the following resolution, and move its adoption.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 496.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. SHERMAN E. BURROUGHS, a Representative from the State of New Hampshire.

Resolved, That a committee of 12 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The question was taken, and the resolution was unanimously agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following committee:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WASON, Mr. GREENE of Vermont, Mr. DALE, Mr. WINSLOW, Mr. TAGUE, Mr. DENISON, Mr. DALLINGER, Mr. VESTAL, Mr. HERSEY, Mr. LEA of California, Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, and Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the additional resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect, this House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 30, 1923, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

923. A letter from the Public Printer, transmitting a report to Congress of the operations of the Government Printing Office for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1922; to the Committee on Printing.

924. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting report as to the rents received from properties located on sites of proposed public buildings purchased by the United States Government in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

925. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a tentative draft of a bill providing that hereafter all moneys arising from the disposition, as authorized by law and regulations, of serviceable military supplies and equipment of the Engineer Corps, Air Service, and Chemical Warfare Service shall constitute for each of said services a separate fund on the books of the Treasury Department, which shall be available to replace such military supplies and equipment throughout the fiscal year in which the dispositions were effected and throughout the following fiscal year; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT FIXING PRESIDENTIAL TERMS, ETC.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to call attention to something that happened yesterday in the Senate when I was not in the Chamber; and I want to call attention to what I believe was an error and perhaps make an explanation in regard to it.

I was not here yesterday when the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] was talking upon some pending motion to refer a bill to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I think that was the motion. He was interrupted by the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who called the attention of the Senate to a condition relating to an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and is now on the calendar. I want to read just a little from the RECORD as to what the Senator from Minnesota said. He said:

A moment ago the Senator from Connecticut referred to a joint resolution proposing a certain amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which joint resolution had been referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

I have not read the part of the RECORD in which the Senator from Connecticut made that reference. However, if he made the same mistake the Senator from Minnesota has made, I shall be able to correct that wrongful impression.

I desire—

Said the Senator from Minnesota—

to make a brief statement in reference to that matter.

The joint resolution proposed an amendment of the Constitution to dispense with the presidential electors and to provide for a direct vote of the people for President.

He was referring then to a joint resolution reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. He proceeded:

At the last session of Congress the Senator from Nebraska introduced a similar joint resolution contemplating such an amendment, and accompanied it with a statement on the floor. At his suggestion that joint resolution was referred to the Judiciary Committee, of which he is a member, and, on his own request, I appointed him chairman of a subcommittee to consider the joint resolution proposing the constitutional amendment. That joint resolution is still pending before the Judiciary Committee and is still in the hands of the subcommittee of which the Senator from Nebraska is chairman.

Mr. President, with the exception of my asking the Senator to appoint me as chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Minnesota stated the matter correctly. I did introduce such a joint resolution at the last regular session of Congress. I accompanied it with a short statement at the time I introduced it. I asked that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. At the next meeting of the Committee on the Judiciary I asked that the joint resolution be referred to a subcommittee. The chairman of the committee very courteously appointed me as chairman of the subcommittee. So, with that simple correction, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee stated the matter correctly.

I realize, as I think every Senator does, that a Senator who is chairman of one of the great committees of the Senate has practically no time to devote to committee work on committees of which he is not chairman. I have found that with the work of the Agricultural Committee, much of which of course the Senate never considers because it does not get here, my time is entirely taken up; in fact, I could devote, if I had it, twice the time I do devote to that committee. I have tried to perform properly my duties as chairman of that committee.

Mr. President, personally I would be glad to be relieved from that arduous duty because there are so many details and so much work that takes time, not only of the Senator but of the force in his office, that he does not have an opportunity or time to consider other matters in which he is greatly interested. I myself suggested, when the committees of the present Congress were selected by the committee on committees, that I thought Senators like myself, who are chairmen of great committees, ought not to be put on any other committee, and I was perfectly willing that the rule should apply to me if it likewise applied to every other chairman. I would be glad to see that course followed now. I think it ought to be done.

But, Mr. President, I was deeply interested in the joint resolution. Notwithstanding the fact that my time was so taken up, I tried my very best to get a meeting of the subcommittee and to get action on the joint resolution. I have never been able even to get a meeting of the subcommittee. I have called a meeting at various times, but not during this session, because I gave it up last session. I say that without any criticism of the members of the subcommittee. They were likewise busy on other things. One of them at least was chairman of another subcommittee which was having hearings.

It was a physical impossibility to get consideration of the joint resolution. Whatever blame attaches to me I gladly accept and assume full responsibility. However, the next part of the statement of the Senator from Minnesota is erroneous, as I think I shall be able to show, and if anyone questions it I think I can demonstrate it from the RECORD.

At this session of Congress—

Said the Senator from Minnesota—

the Senator from Nebraska introduced another joint resolution having in view the same object.

That is erroneous. I did not do it.

It was done at a time when I was not present in the Senate.

That is the reason why the Senator was mistaken. If he had been present and had remembered it he would realize that I did not introduce the joint resolution.

At all events, it escaped my attention. The Senator from Nebraska had that joint resolution proposing the same constitutional amendment referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry—

That is erroneous. It was not the same kind of a resolution. It was not introduced by me and I had nothing whatever to do with the reference of the joint resolution to the Committee on Agriculture. But the Senator went on to say—and from that committee he succeeded in securing a report on the joint resolution.

I did succeed in getting a report from the Committee on Agriculture.

I have been patiently waiting for him, as chairman of the subcommittee, to submit a report to the full Judiciary Committee on the joint resolution which he introduced and had referred to that committee, and which is still pending there.

I am finding no fault whatever with the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. I think he did his full duty. He did it promptly. Under no circumstances have I ever in the slightest degree indicated, even indirectly, any criticism. I am as much to blame as anybody, and the reason why I am to blame for the delay in reporting that joint resolution of mine from the Judiciary Committee is the reason I have already stated. Be it good or bad, those are the facts.

But, Mr. President, the resolution which was reported by me from the Committee on Agriculture, while it did provide for an amendment to the Constitution, was a committee resolution. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] one day introduced a concurrent resolution in the Senate. It had reference to Members of Congress who had been defeated at the recent election and who were then and are now participating in general legislation. It was referred to the Committee on Agriculture. It had reference to the meeting of the old Congress after the new one had been elected by the people. I was present when that reference was made. It was not done covertly. The Chair stated it fairly, and he made the reference after he had made a statement of the request of the Senator from Arkansas. I did not have anything to do with the preparation of the concurrent resolution. I had no knowledge that it was going to be introduced. It was referred, I think, as a joke to the Committee on Agriculture. There was a smile in the Senate that such a resolution should be referred to the Committee on Agriculture. But it was so referred, and it was not referred at my request. No such request was made by me. It was the action of the Senate. The Senator from Arkansas plainly in the open Senate made the request. The Chair asked if there was any objection and there was none.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. NORRIS. I gladly yield to the Senator.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator will also recall that I called attention to the fact that the jurisdiction was properly with the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NORRIS. I remember it distinctly.

Mr. CARAWAY. So that no one was deceived.

Mr. NORRIS. No one was deceived, but everybody laughed when it was referred to the Committee on Agriculture. The long-whiskered farmers on the Committee on Agriculture took the matter seriously. We went to work on it. We thought that the resolution introduced by the Senator from Arkansas did not provide a remedy for the evil to which he called attention in the whereases, that there had been an election and a new Congress elected but the old Congress was still doing business. He also called attention to some legislation to which it referred. I do not know whether he called attention to it or not, but it was a fact that the resolution in effect was passed by some organization and it was then introduced by him.

Now, the Committee on Agriculture took it up seriously. I was directed by the Committee on Agriculture to report a substitute resolution which would, we thought, meet the difficulty and which required a constitutional amendment in order to accomplish it. I drafted the joint resolution. It had two parts to it, one pertaining to the presidential electors and the other having reference to the fixing of the beginning of a term of Congress which in effect would do away with the short session of Congress and would provide for the meeting on the first Monday in January of the new Congress elected in November. After I had prepared the joint resolution, at a subsequent meeting of the Subcommittee on Agriculture, I read it. It was again referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and I was directed by a unanimous vote of that committee to report it to the Senate.

Mr. President, that is the history of the joint resolution. If we had followed the ordinary procedure the resolution would not have been referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. At the time I did not wish to have it referred to that committee; I myself had an impulse to object, but it seemed to me that, being the chairman of the committee, an objection would probably not come with good grace from me. So I remained silent, and the committee assumed the burden which the Senate put upon it. We have discharged our duty as best we knew how. Those are the facts with reference to the joint resolution which is now on the calendar.

Mr. President, I wish to say, as I have once before said, that I contemplate making a motion to take up the joint resolution before this session of Congress shall have expired, as soon as we shall have disposed of the so-called rural credits bill, which is now pending.

I thought I ought to say this much now, because the Senator from Connecticut as well as the Senator from Minnesota was laboring under a misapprehension as to the joint resolution. I make the statement in justice to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, which did not seek this responsibility. It was put upon them by the Senate itself, and having been placed there, we have undertaken to perform our duty as we understood it. I may add that at the time the concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who himself is a member of the Judiciary Committee, was in the chair.

CALL OF THE ROLL.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gooding	McCormick	Shortridge
Brookhart	Hale	McCumber	Smith
Bursum	Harris	McKellar	Smoot
Cameron	Harrison	McLean	Spencer
Capper	Hefflin	McNary	Stanfield
Caraway	Hitchcock	Nelson	Sutherland
Colt	Johnson	New	Townsend
Couzens	Jones, Wash.	Nicholson	Trammell
Culberson	Kellogg	Norbeck	Underwood
Curtis	Kendrick	Norris	Wadsworth
Ernst	King	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Fletcher	Ladd	Overman	Walsh, Mont.
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Page	Warren
George	Lenroot	Ransdell	Watson
Glass	Lodge	Reed, Pa.	Williams

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is detained at home on account of sickness. I ask that this notice may stand for the day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to announce that the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] are detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] are absent on the business of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

DEPARTMENTAL USE OF AUTOMOBILES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, in partial response to Senate Resolution 399, agreed to January 6, 1923, reporting relative to the number and cost of maintenance of passenger-carrying automobiles in use by the War Department in the city of Washington, which was ordered to lie on the table.

WITHDRAWALS AND RESTORATIONS OF PUBLIC LAND.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report showing the withdrawals and restorations of public lands during the period beginning December 1, 1921, and ending November 21, 1922, and also the areas embraced in outstanding withdrawals at the latter date, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

CHESAPEAKE & POTOMAC TELEPHONE CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the president of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co., transmitting, pursuant to law, the final annual report of the company for the year 1922, to be substituted for the report heretofore submitted in which the results of the operations of the company for the month of December were only estimated, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

BOARD OF VISITORS TO THE NAVAL ACADEMY.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. PAGE, Mr. PEPPER, Mr. ODDIE, Mr. GERRY, and Mr. SWANSON as members of the Board of Visitors on the part of the Senate to visit the Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md., pursuant to the provisions of the act of August 29, 1916.

PETITIONS.

Mr. LADD presented petitions of sundry citizens of Gladstone, Chaseley, and Enderlin, all in the State of North Dakota, praying for the passage of legislation extending immediate aid to the famine-stricken peoples of the German and Austrian Republics, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

BAKER RECLAMATION PROJECT, OREGON.

Mr. McNARY presented the following joint memorial of the Legislature of Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation:

Senate joint memorial.

To the Hon. A. P. DAVIS,
Director of the United States Reclamation Service.

We, your memorialists, the Senate of the State of Oregon, the House of Representatives concurring, respectfully represent: That

"Whereas the United States Reclamation Service has made an exhaustive examination and survey of what is known as the Baker project, located in Baker County in this State; and

"Whereas estimates are about to be submitted covering the feasibility and cost of said project; and

"Whereas an examination of the soil and climatic conditions has been made by Prof. W. L. Powers, soil expert of the Oregon Agricultural College, and that the report is that the soil conditions and climatic conditions are wholly satisfactory and the soil of more than average fertility, and that the conditions are extremely favorable for the building of a successful project and providing homes for a large number of people and bringing under cultivation a large acreage of land and resulting in a large increase of population and wealth in the State of Oregon; and

"Whereas the State of Oregon has paid into the reclamation fund from the sale of public lands a large sum of money, and the sum of money paid into said fund is greatly in excess of the sum of money received therefrom; and

"Whereas the said Baker project, tentatively adopted by the Reclamation Service, is the only new project in the State of Oregon; and

"Whereas the said project will come before the said Director of the United States Reclamation Service for final approval; and

"Whereas the said project, on account of its proximity to the national forest furnishing cheap lumber for improvements, its close proximity to active markets, its soil and climatic conditions, can stand a high cost per acre for building; and

"Whereas the building of the said project will be an important factor in the encouragement of irrigation in the State of Oregon and stimulating the reclamation of thousands of acres of the arid lands of said State: Now therefore we, your memorialists, do hereby

"Resolve, That the Senate of the State of Oregon, the House of Representatives concurring, favor the building of the said Baker project and do hereby urge that the said project have favorable consideration at your hands and do urge upon you that you finally approve the building of the said project; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the Senate of the State of Oregon be directed to transmit a copy of this memorial to the Hon. A. P. Davis, Director of the United States Reclamation Service, and to each of the Senators and Representatives from the State of Oregon in Congress."

Concurred in by the House January 19, 1923.

K. K. KUBIE,
Speaker of the House.

Adopted by the Senate January 18, 1923.

JAY UPTON,
President of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. NEW, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 4425) to authorize appropriations for the relief of certain officers of the Army of the United States, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1071) thereon.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back the bill (S. 4362) to provide aid from the United States for the several States in prevention and control of drug addiction and the care and treatment of drug addicts, and for other purposes, and ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration. I suggest that the bill should go to the Committee on Finance, as that committee has charge of the subject matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Committee on Appropriations will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and it will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bill (S. 4119) authorizing the erection in the city of Washington of a monument in memory of the faithful colored mammies of the South, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1072) thereon.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4061) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to enter into an agreement with Toole County irrigation district, of Shelby, Mont., and the Cut Bank irrigation district, of Cut Bank, Mont., for the settlement of the extent of the priority to the waters of Two Medicine, Cut Bank, and Badger Creeks of the Indians of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1073) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10211) authorizing an appropriation to meet proportionate expenses of providing a drainage system for Piute Indian lands in the State of Nevada within the Newlands reclamation project of the Reclamation Service, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1074) thereon.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4404) authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer to trustees to be named by the Chamber of Commerce of Columbia, S. C., certain lands at Camp Jackson, S. C., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1075) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JOHNSON:

A bill (S. 4440) to amend section 9 of the trading with the enemy act, approved October 6, 1917, as amended; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 4441) granting a pension to Millie Newman; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ODDIE:

A bill (S. 4442) to renew and extend certain letters patent; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 4443) granting an increase of pension to Alice J. Hunt (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 4444) granting a pension to Thomas J. Boice; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PHIPPS:

A bill (S. 4445) to amend the first paragraph of section 2 of the act entitled "An act to fix and regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the Board of Education of the District of Columbia," approved June 20, 1906, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 4446) granting a pension to Oscar E. Burrow (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

RURAL-CREDIT FACILITIES.

Mr. NORBECK submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States, to amend the Federal farm loan act, to amend the Federal reserve act, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENTS OF WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADSWORTH submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of War to permit, without cost to the United States, the erection of monuments or memorials in the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park to commemorate encampments of Spanish War organizations which were encamped in said park during the period of the Spanish-American War, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 13793, the War Department appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment providing that the mileage allowance to members of the Officers' Reserve Corps when called into active service for training for 15 days or less shall not exceed 4 cents per mile, etc., intended to be proposed by him to House bill 13793, the War Department appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for activities of the national board for promotion of rifle practice, quartermaster supplies, and services for rifle ranges for civilian instruction, etc., from $20,000 to $89,900, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 13793, the War Department appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment providing that the master of the sword at the Military Academy, upon the completion of his service, shall be entitled to be placed upon the retired list of the Army (with the rank of lieutenant colonel) under the same conditions as are prescribed by law for other officers of the Army, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 13793, the War Department appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment providing that no part of the appropriations made in the act shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made with a stop watch or other time-measuring device a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof, or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 13793, the War Department appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment providing that hereafter the cost of transportation of civilian employees and of material in connection with the manufacturing and purchasing activities of the Signal Corps, Air Service, Medical Department, Ordnance Department, Engineer Department, and the Coast Artillery Corps, and in connection with the construction and installation of fire-control projects at seacoast fortifications by the Coast Artillery Corps, may be charged to the appropriations for the work in connection with which such transportation charges are required, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 13793, the War Department appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE.

Mr. BORAH. I submit a resolution, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 426) was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

Resolved, That the President is authorized and requested to invite such governments as he may deem necessary or expedient to send representatives to a conference which shall be charged with the duty of considering the economic problems now obtaining throughout the world with a view of arriving at such adjustments or settlement as may seem essential to the restoration of trade and to the establishment of sound financial and business conditions; and also to consider the subject of further limitation of armaments with a view of reaching an understanding or agreement upon said matter, both by land and by sea, and particularly relative to limiting the construction of all types and sizes of subsurface and surface craft of 10,000 tons standard displacement or less, and of aircraft.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. CALDER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 427), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Senate Resolution 444, agreed to March 3, 1921, authorizing the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to continue the employment of an assistant clerk, payable out of the contingent fund, until the end of the present Congress, be, and the same hereby is, further continued in full force and effect until the end of the Sixty-eighth Congress.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON MINES AND MINING.

Mr. POINDEXTER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 428), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Mines and Mining or any subcommittee thereof be, and hereby is, authorized, during the Sixty-seventh Congress, to send for persons, book and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per 100 words to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 472) for the relief of William B. Lancaster, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

WILLIAM B. LANCASTER.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 472) for the relief of William B. Lancaster, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to William B. Lancaster, during his natural life, the sum of $40 per month, to date from the passage of this act, as compensation for injuries sustained while employed by the Reclamation Service at the west portal, Strawberry Tunnel, Strawberry Valley project, Utah, said monthly payments to be paid through the United States Employees' Compensation Commission.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, yesterday afternoon I called up for consideration the conference report on the annual Agricultural appropriation bill and made a formal motion with respect to certain amendments. At the request of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] I consented that the matter might go over until to-day. By way of a parliamentary inquiry I desire to know if it is necessary to renew my motion, or is it carried over to this time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator may ask unanimous consent to take the report from the table, and then the motion heretofore made by him will be pending.

Mr. McNARY. I ask unanimous consent that the report of the conference committee on the annual Agricultural appropriation bill may be taken from the table.

There being no objection, the Vice President laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on certain amendments of the Senate to House bill 13481, the Agricultural Department appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the motion of the Senator from Oregon which is now pending.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] moved that the Senate agree to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 11, 31, 33, and 35, and that the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 34.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon if the conference report represents a full agreement on the Agricultural appropriation bill?

Mr. McNARY. It does.

Mr. HARRISON. I have not had time to go over the report in detail and I should like to ask the Senator what was done with some of the Senate amendments, notably the one making an appropriation for the investigation of insects prevalent in my section of the country affecting the sweet potato?

Mr. McNARY. That item as passed by the Senate is found on page 51 of the bill and reads:

For investigations of insects affecting truck crops, including insects affecting the potato, sugar beet, cabbage, onion, tomato, beans, peas, etc., and insects affecting stored products, $173,000.

The Bureau of the Budget estimated $123,000 for this item; the House appropriated $123,000; the Senate committee recommended $123,000, but on the floor of the Senate the appropriation was increased $50,000 under the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi. That brought the total to $173,000. The Senate conferees, however, after discussing the matter at length with the House conferees, yielded to the House conferees and the item stands now at $123,000.

Mr. HARRISON. I am very sorry to hear that; it will be very bad news to those who are interested in the cultivation of sweet potatoes.

I should like to ask the Senator also what was done with respect to the provision for market news wire service?

Mr. McNARY. That provision was left in the bill as the Senate passed it, appropriating $700,000 to provide for the distribution annually by wire of market news. Under the appropriation the service may be provided for the Pacific coast and the Southeastern States bordering on the Gulf and the Atlantic Ocean.

Mr. HARRISON. Were any other of the amounts reduced in conference where the appropriations were increased on the floor of the Senate?

Mr. McNARY. I will say to the Senator that by amendment numbered 4 in the item which provides for collecting data concerning frost damage, the Senate inserted a provision with regard to spraying, and that was eliminated by the conferees; so the item remains the same as it came over from the House.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, I do not want to pry into any of the secrets of the conference; but I suppose it was contended by the conferees representing the House that the sweet-potato item was eliminated because the Bureau of the Budget had not recommended it?

Mr. McNARY. I will say to the Senator that that was not the sole consideration. Of course, it is always an element in the discussion of such a matter and arriving at a solution of the problem. I think the House conferees did mention that fact, but we thought the amount appropriated under this item as it reads now was sufficient to do this work.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, the Senator made every effort to carry out the wishes of the Senate as expressed by the adoption of the amendment?

Mr. McNARY. Oh, I can say to the Senator that I never worked harder in my life.

Mr. HARRISON. I am sure of that.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the next item is concerning barberry eradication. The House appropriated $350,000 for this purpose. The Senate increased the House appropriation to $500,000 on the floor. The conferees agreed upon $425,000 for this purpose, making $125,000 available for cooperative work, in the hope that those States and communities where the infestation occurs will more actively cooperate with the Government in the control and eradication of the barberry.

The next item is the sweet-potato item, to which I have called attention.

The next item is the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTEIDGE], where he made a reservation that $150,000 of the money appropriated to extinguish predatory animals should go to California. The Senate conferees yielded on that provision.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senate conferees yielded? Is that important item now stricken from the bill?

Mr. McNARY. The item is not so important as the Senator from Mississippi might think when he reads it.

Mr. HARRISON. I heard the very eloquent speech of the junior Senator from California, and he led me to believe that it was very important.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield—

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. KING. Before leaving that item, may I inquire whether the amount carried in the bill as it left the Senate was reduced, or did the conferees merely strike out the language which required a certain amount of the appropriation to be expended solely in the State of California?

Mr. McNARY. I will state to the Senator from Utah that the amount was not increased or decreased. It remained the same; but the provision which provided for the expenditure of $150,000 in California was stricken from the bill, so that the language of the bill is general in its nature, and no part of it is confined to any one particular State.

Mr. KING. I am very glad to know that, because the provision, may I say to the Senator, with the indulgence of the Senator from Mississippi, seemed to me to be very unfair and discriminatory. If funds which are appropriated for a section are to be segregated in the bill, and one State is to receive a given quantity, then obviously the other States would be deprived of their proportionate share, and it would lead ultimately to a complete division of the fund in the appropriation bill, leading to wild scrambles between sections, and would divorce the authority expending it from any discretion or any power in the matter. I congratulate the Senator on having eliminated that very unwise and, I was about to say, indefensible provision.

Mr. HARRISON. Evidently the Senator from Utah was not in the Chamber when the junior Senator from California presented the amendment and discussed it or he might have changed the opinion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. That may be. The Senator from California has great influence with the Senator from Utah; but I am inclined to think that in this matter his eloquence would have been in vain.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from California is temporarily out of the Chamber. I have sent for him so that he can again elaborate upon this subject if he desires.

Referring to amendment numbered 3, relating to investigations, observations and reports, forecasts, warnings, and advices for agricultural interests during the harvest season, was that included or did the Senate recede on that amendment?

Mr. McNARY. What page is that on, please?

Mr. HARRISON. That is on page 15 of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. The Senate receded on that.

Mr. HARRISON. The other important item is amendment numbered 4, about spraying.

Mr. McNARY. The Senate receded on that item.

Mr. HARRISON. As to amendment numbered 5, touching the white-pine blister rust, the Senate receded on that, did it?

Mr. McNARY. I will state to the Senator that the House receded on that item and the $50,000 which was added to the bill for the purpose of scouting work in connection with the infestation of Northwestern States was retained; so the item is $250,000 rather than $200,000, as passed by the House.

Mr. HARRISON. Was amendment numbered 8, with respect to sugar-plant investigation, retained?

Mr. McNARY. The House receded from that, and the Senate amendment adding $10,000 was accepted.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from California is now in his seat with respect to his amendment.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I inquire touching the item referred to? I was not in the Chamber when it was brought up.

Mr. HARRISON. I will say to the Senator from California as to the item he had incorporated in the Agricultural bill, which, as I was led to believe, was quite important to the people of California—

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It certainly was, and is.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senate has receded, or is about to recede when it adopts this report, on that item, and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] was just discussing it. He took a different view from that presented by the Senator from California; and I just expressed to him the thought that if he had heard the distinguished Senator from California present this matter he would have the same conviction that I have, namely, that the Senator from California was correct, and that the Senate should not have receded from this item.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I thank the Senator for his expressions. I recall the discussion concerning that particular item. I assume that many Senators present also recall what was then said. I made an effort to have the appropriation increased, but under a point of order, which was sustained by the Presiding Officer, my amendment so to increase was ruled out. The upshot of the discussion was that of the $502,000 mentioned in the bill to be devoted to the purposes stated the Senate voted in effect to give permission to the Secretary of Agriculture to devote $150,000 of that sum to California in and about the destruction of these very destructive predatory animals.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Was any reason given, if that amendment was not placed in the bill, why the Secretary could not expend that amount in the Senator's State?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. An effort was made in the House by Representative RAKER to incorporate that sum in the bill, and make it in effect permissive for the Secretary of Agriculture to expend that amount in the State of California for the purpose named. His effort was unsuccessful, because of a point of order raised.

To repeat myself, if the Senator desires to hear an answer to his question—

Mr. WARREN. If there is an answer to it, I should like to hear it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes; I say, an effort was made in the House to have this sum made available for the purpose stated, and to be devoted to the State of California, reasons being assigned. That effort was unsuccessful. The bill came here. I moved to amend it by increasing the amount by $150,000 for those purposes. A point of order was raised and sustained as to increasing the amount, so that the amount devoted to the various purposes was left at $502,000. I believe that was the sum. I then moved to add a proviso, which is found in the bill, that of the $502,000 the sum of $150,000 might be expended in the State of California. In perfect candor I stated that it was not mandatory on the Secretary of Agriculture to devote that amount to that State; that it was permissive; and it took on that form.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Was there any language in the bill which would have forbidden the Secretary of Agriculture devoting to California for the extermination of predatory animals such portion of the fund appropriated as he deemed necessary and equitable, taking into account the needs of the other States?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. In a word, I answer "No." Of course, Senators will also recall that I did not forget Arizona or Utah or Colorado—

Mr. KING. Or California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Or other States infested by these predatory animals; but I ventured to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that California was territorially a very large State; that a vast percentage of her lands is public lands; and that of the public lands a large percentage is mountain and forest, the breeding place of these predatory animals, so that, to make an end of the matter, the amendment in the nature of a proviso was an expression, perhaps, of the feeling of the Senate in respect to the State of California and its needs, wherefore the amendment was permissive, not mandatory; and in that fashion it was approved by the Senate and found its way into the bill. I was not in the Chamber when the report of the conferees was taken up, but I see no reason why that expression of the Senate should not remain in the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. In the absence of the Senator and when the item was inquired about by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and the able Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] had stated what the action of the conferees was, I suggested that I thought their action in eliminating the proviso which the able Senator from California had had sufficient influence in the Senate to have inserted in the bill was very wise; that where a fund of this character was appropriated for a certain section where there is a good deal of homogeneity, if I may use that expression, with respect to the section and its needs and purposes, I regarded it as rather unfair and unwise to segregate, even by a permissive expression in the bill, the fund itself, because that very permissive expression would be regarded by the able Senator from California, and certainly by his constituents, as being a direction to the Secretary of Agriculture to expend at least that amount in California, and it would be seized upon by those who sought the expenditure of that fund in California as a fulcrum for tremendous propaganda to bring pressure to bear upon the Secretary of Agriculture to induce him to expend the entire sum in that State. So I was very glad when the Senate conferees, out of the plenitude of their great wisdom, saw fit to yield upon this matter of disagreement and failed to follow the distinguished and able Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am sometimes reluctantly forced to concede that I have not very much influence. But not to detain the Senate long, in point of very truth that proviso should have been mandatory in its terms. If it were worth while, or I thought my words to be effective here to-day, I would urge that the amount specified be expended in my State. The conditions were such, they are such, as to warrant that expenditure. I sought to have the $502,000 item enhanced by $150,000, the latter sum to be devoted to California, but my effort in that direction was defeated by the point of order raised, not by the other side, if there be two sides in this Chamber, but by mine own particular friends. I had then to content myself with what was done by the Senate. I am not here questioning the wisdom of the conferees, though perhaps all wisdom will not die with them. "If mine enemy had exalted himself before me, peradventure I could have borne it," but mine own particular friends—that is beyond patient bearing.

Mr. KING. Et tu Brute!

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Has the conference report been agreed to?

Mr. McNARY. It has.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. What is the immediate matter before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon to agree to the House amendments to Senate amendments numbered 11, 31, 33, and 35, and to recede from its amendment numbered 34.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the conference report had not been agreed to in the Senate, would not that be the first proposition to be submitted to the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. May I ask, for information, as to whether amendment numbered 22 was agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Amendment numbered 22 has already been agreed to.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I move to reconsider the vote by which amendment numbered 22 was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That would reopen the whole conference report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would be necessary to move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to the conference report.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I make such motion.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. KING. Do I understand that the statement of the Chair means that the report of the conferees upon all items of disagreement has been agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Except five items which were reported in disagreement. The others have been agreed to.

Mr. KING. May I inquire further, if the Chair will indulge me, whether that was upon some preceding day?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was; the 22d of January.

Mr. KING. I was not here and was not advised of it. Then the matters now before the Senate are matters which had not been agreed upon; the bill went back to conference, and this is the final report of the conferees?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill went back to the House and the House acted on certain amendments to it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not wish to detain the Senate or provoke discussion, but to the end that this particular amendment, numbered 22, may be considered on its merits, I move to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was adopted.

Mr. LENROOT. May I inquire when the conference report was agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. On January 22.

Mr. LENROOT. More than two legislative days have intervened, and I make the point of order that the motion is not in order.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, was this particular item in the conference report which was agreed to?

Mr. McNARY. This particular item was considered by the conferees, of course, and the Senate conferees receded, and on the 22d of January the report was adopted, except as to the five items which are now before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Then the report of the conferees was not adopted as a whole, but it was in part adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the item in which the Senator is interested one of the items included in the motion of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think not.

Mr. NORRIS. The item in which the Senator is interested has already been passed on by the adoption of the conference report?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. So I am informed.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, it is clearly out of order to undertake to reconsider a conference report agreed to on the 22d.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so rules.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I did not know I had lost the floor. I only yielded to the Senator from California to discuss what I thought was a very important amendment. I thought I still held the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not desire to take the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. I just wanted to inquire about some of the items in the conference report. I remember I asked the Senator from Oregon about the item on page 41, where the Senate amended the appropriation of $110,000, and made it $135,000, for silvicultural, dendrological, and other experiments and investigations with respect to our forests. Did the Senate recede on that item?

Mr. McNARY. The Senate receded on that item so that there would be sufficient funds to erect forest stations in the New England country and the Great Lakes region.

Mr. HARRISON. Did the House recede on the item with respect to the corn borer. The Senate adopted an amendment to that item.

Mr. McNARY. The House receded on that item.

Mr. HARRISON. That is one victory for the Senate, then. The amendment on page 55, amendment No. 22, is the one we have been discussing, which affects California and which the Senator from California has done everything in his power to bring to the attention of the Senate, but which he can not bring to our attention because of the rules. Amendment No. 25 is for the enforcement of the United States grain standards act.

Mr. McNARY. The House receded on that, with an amendment. The amount now appropriated is $541,223.

Mr. HARRISON. The House receded on that?

Mr. McNARY. The House receded, with an amendment. The amount was decreased $5,000.

Mr. HARRISON. There was a kind of a dog fall there. Amendment numbered 27, on page 72, referred to the distribution of the publications on "Diseases of the Horse" and "Diseases of Cattle." Did the Senate recede on that?

Mr. McNARY. The House receded on that item.

Mr. HARRISON. Amendment numbered 28 was a very important one. I recall that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] talked a good deal about the black-leg disease. What was done with respect to that amendment?

Mr. McNARY. The Senate receded on that amendment for the reason that the item was not at the proper place, and another provision of the bill takes care of the item.

Mr. HARRISON. So it is taken care of?

Mr. McNARY. It is.

Mr. HARRISON. So the black leg will be treated. Then there was an amendment touching the motor-vehicle proposition. I do not see the Senator from Tennessee in his seat at this time. He has given great study to this motor-vehicle proposition. Was amendment numbered 29 accepted by the House?

Mr. McNARY. Yes; I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that the House receded from its disagreement on that item.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senate was again triumphant.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is always so when it increases appropriations, especially for extravagances of that kind.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator from Oregon about that item?

Mr. McNARY. It was to effect an economy in travel from station to station by those connected with the department, that they might receive compensation for gasoline they use rather than hire a vehicle to carry them from place to place.

Mr. HARRISON. Was amendment numbered 30 agreed to by the House, the amendment with respect to the Center Market?

Mr. McNARY. The House receded on that amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. That is a very important amendment. Did the House agree to amendment 31, on page 84?

Mr. McNARY. The House receded on that, with an amendment. The Senate attempted to make the law permanent by using the word "hereafter." The House receded with an amendment so as to make it applicable only for the year 1924.

Mr. HARRISON. What was done with respect to amendment numbered 34, relating to the purchase of seed for drought-stricken areas?

Mr. McNARY. That was in disagreement. It went back to the House, and their conferees' action was sustained, and it is here now before the Senate for action.

Mr. HARRISON. That is one of the amendments now pending?

Mr. McNARY. That and the one relating to maximum salaries.

Mr. HARRISON. Was there a separate vote in the House on that proposition?

Mr. JONES of Washington. They have, and they insisted on their disagreement.

Mr. HARRISON. That, perhaps, will be debated somewhat again, will it not?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It will not be debated by me.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator must have very strong convictions on the subject.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am convinced that the House would not recede, and I think it would be a waste of time to discuss it in the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. What was done with respect to the amendment regarding the barberry bush?

Mr. McNARY. I think I answered an inquiry in regard to that propounded by the Senator from Mississippi a few moments ago.

Mr. HARRISON. No; I did not ask with respect to the barberry. I asked with respect to the corn borer and the Mexican bean beetle, I believe it is called, and the sweet-potato weevil, but not this particular item.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I am afraid my friend is more interested in asking questions than listening to the answers, because the Senator from Oregon explained that item a moment ago.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not see my friend from Wisconsin present when barberry came up. It is so closely allied to some other names that are nearly like "barberry" that I really did not pay attention to the answer.

Mr. McNARY. Answering the Senator from Mississippi, the House provided $350,000. The Senate added $150,000, making a total of $500,000. We compromised on the basis of $425,000, with $125,000 to be used in cooperation with the various States where the infestation occurs.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, on yesterday the President of the United States, through the Vice President, delivered an address to the heads of the departments of the Government in the city of Washington. He praised the Bureau of the Budget. He assumed responsibility for the estimates that had been submitted to the Congress. In the closing sentence of that address the President of the United States said:

I tender my thanks and appreciation for services rendered.

In the course of the speech, however, the President said—

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. Before the Senator continues his speech would he be willing to yield, that I may submit a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I yield for that purpose.

RURAL-CREDIT FACILITIES.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask unanimous consent that beginning tomorrow at 1 o'clock, if the rural credits bill (S. 4287) has not then been disposed of, all debate upon the bill be limited to 20 minutes upon the bill and to 10 minutes upon any amendment pending or that may be offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HARRISON. Let the Secretary state the proposition, so we may understand it clearly.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. That from and after 1 o'clock p. m. on to-morrow no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 20 minutes upon the bill, nor more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment that may then be pending or that may be offered.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gooding	McCormick	Smith
Ball	Hale	McCumber	Smoot
Borah	Harris	McKellar	Stanfield
Brookhart	Harrison	McNary	Sterling
Cameron	Heflin	Nelson	Sutherland
Capper	Hitchcock	New	Swanson
Caraway	Johnson	Norbeck	Townsend
Couzens	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Trammell
Culberson	Kellogg	Oddie	Underwood
Curtis	Kendrick	Overman	Wadsworth
Ernst	King	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Fletcher	Ladd	Poinexter	Walsh, Mont.
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Pomeroy	Warren
Georg	Lenroot	Ransdell
Glass	Lodge	Shields

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let the request be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. That from and after 1 o'clock p. m. on to-morrow no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 20 minutes upon the bill, nor more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment that may then be pending or that may be offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me say that there are some very important amendments to the bill, and there are some of us who up to this time have not discussed the particular measure now pending. We very much desire to discuss it at the proper time. It is foolish to attempt to discuss an amendment before it is pending. On yesterday I offered two amendments to the bill, one which would compel the Federal Farm Loan Board to locate in each agricultural or live-stock State a branch bank or agency where a Federal land bank was not located in that particular State. I have an idea that we ought to carry this proposition just as close to the people as it is possible. I believe that by the establishment in each State of an agency or branch bank more people would have an opportunity to take advantage of the provisions of the bill, more people would come within the provisions of the bill, and greater relief would be carried to them. I have every hope that the amendment will be agreed to. If there is any opposition to it, there ought to be full discussion of it, and no one, not even the Senator from Wisconsin, with all his ingenuity and splendid ability, could properly discuss it in 10 minutes. Yet if the unanimous-consent request should be granted we would be precluded from talking longer than 10 minutes on an important amendment like that.

I offered another amendment yesterday. Those amendments, perhaps, are not any more important in the opinion of various individual Senators than the amendments which they themselves have offered. The other amendment which I offered would permit the credit association to loan directly to the individual. Senator after Senator has stated that he would be glad to see such a system put in operation; that certainly it would remove the increased interest rates which a bank would be permitted to charge upon the individual when they discount the individual's paper, and then go to the credit association and get the paper rediscounted. In other words, we will open up a channel or an avenue so that the individual may go direct to the credit association and borrow money if he has adequate security. That is an important amendment. That is an amendment which would bring sure enough relief to the farmers of the country, and would remove an overhead in interest charges that would be tremendous.

Does any one mean to tell me that an amendment of such magnitude and importance as that could be discussed by any Senator within the limit of 10 minutes? It is too important for such a limitation. Free and full discussion should be allowed on all the amendments that may be offered and upon the merits of the bill.

The distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], laboring in behalf of the farmers of the country, wants agricultural relief. He believes the best way to get it is through what is known as the Norbeck bill. There are others who hold different views. We think the best way to get real legislation at this time is through the pending measure, with some amendments. The Senator from South Dakota will, no doubt, offer his bill at some stage of the proceeding as a substitute for the pending bill or in some other form, and a matter of such tremendous importance as that can not be discussed in 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to the fact that while the question of a unanimous-consent agreement is subject to debate, if the Senator desires to object, the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] to agree to the amendments of the House to certain amendments of the Senate to the Agricultural Department appropriation bill is now pending.

Mr. HARRISON. I had hoped that I might convince the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] that his unanimous-consent request is not reasonable, that the time is too short, and that the unanimous-consent request might be withdrawn at this time. After we have discussed the bill in all its phases, as the Senate has done other measures from time immemorial, then we could agree on a unanimous-consent request that might take care of the situation. For that reason I reserved the right for the moment to object, thinking we might agree to something satisfactory to all.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I suggest to the Senator that the War Department appropriation bill has been reported to the Senate, and the practice has been to consider appropriation bills, I believe, prior to considering other measures. We are not certain how long this particular bill may be before the Senate for consideration, or when it may be laid aside in order to take up an appropriation bill. Therefore, I think it is hardly fair to ask to limit debate upon the bill at this time.

Mr. HARRISON. I was going to come to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Florida objects.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope the Presiding Officer will be very patient with us. This manner of discussion is about as good as any other way to discuss the proposition. There has been no call by any Senator on the other side of the Chamber for the regular order. I dislike to object to the unanimous-consent request, and I thought, perhaps, after we had exchanged views here we might get together upon a unanimous-consent agreement to vote at a certain time upon the bill; but certainly at this time we ought not to limit debate on amendments and on the bill to the short time which is proposed in the suggestion which has been made.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the Senator from Mississippi think that if Senators would be willing to devote themselves to the consideration of the bill and to cut out extraneous subjects, in the discussion of which I thought the Senator from Mississippi was about to indulge when I asked him to yield to me, we could discuss the very matters to which the Senator has referred, and dispose of them before the limit would begin on debate on the pending bill?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator says that if we would confine our remarks to the bill, and if I would stop what he thought I was going to say when he interrupted me, the bill might be speedily disposed of. The Senator does not do me justice. The matter which was before the Senate was a motion by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] touching the conference report on the Agricultural appropriation bill. In connection with that a question arose with respect to the estimates of the Budget Bureau, and I was just starting with a discussion of the Budget Bureau and the expressions of the President yesterday relating to its activities. Then I was going to try to get down to this particular item in order to show that the President had condemned what the Senate did the other day in surrendering to the Budget Bureau all of the power of the Senate to increase an appropriation, although the increase was warranted by all the facts and by the statements of experts; so that so far as confining the discussion to the merits of the subject is concerned, I was going to discuss the merits of the proposition when the Senator from Wisconsin interrupted me.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator indicate how long he will take in order to develop that very interesting subject in all of its ramifications?

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senators on the other side would not interrupt me and cause me to branch off on side issues, it would not take very long.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. I desire to offer as an amendment to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement that consent also be granted that there shall be no further consideration of the ship subsidy bill at this session of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hold that the unanimous-consent proposition submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin has been objected to at the present time. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to propose a unanimous-consent request. I ask unanimous consent that not later than 4 o'clock on next Tuesday all debate close upon the agricultural credits bill, so called; that we begin at that hour to vote upon any amendment that may be then pending until the bill is either passed or defeated; and that during that time no other matter shall be brought before the Senate for discussion or passage except by unanimous consent.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am constrained to object to that request, because I feel certain that we shall dispose of the bill before that time without any limit of debate of the character suggested by the Senator from Mississippi.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is interposed.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish again to announce, in view of the failure of the Senate to come to any agreement for the final disposition of the bill, that I shall ask the Senate, beginning to-morrow night, if the bill shall not by that time have been disposed of, to sit in evening session until it shall be disposed of.

Mr. HARRISON. I am very sorry that the Senator from Wisconsin has objected to my request for unanimous consent. I tried to point out—though I did not finish because of an interruption—why I thought the unanimous-consent request made by the Senator from Wisconsin was not exactly fair. I had referred to the very important amendment which will be offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK]. It will be recalled also that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has an amendment, in the form of a bill, I believe, heretofore introduced by him. It is a very good bill and a very important proposition. He has very strong views with respect to the merits of his bill, and I understand he may offer it in the form of an amendment as a substitute for the pending bill. To try to confine that Senator to a 10 minutes' discussion of so important a question, I say is most unreasonable.

Under the proposal that I made, if we had secured such a unanimous-consent agreement, within six days or a week the debate would be closed, and we could vote upon the agricultural credits bill, after disposing of all amendments. So we could proceed in an orderly way throughout this week without killing Senators by holding night sessions, and compelling them to answer roll calls, and at least half of the time about 99 per cent of the Senators absenting themselves from the Chamber and paying no attention to the discussion. If the proposal which I made had not been objected to, the agricultural credits bill would be out of the way and over to the House of Representatives by next Tuesday night. We could then take up the Army appropriation bill, which is the only appropriation bill, I believe, yet remaining to be considered by the Senate; we could take up measures by unanimous consent and could pass them; but now, under whip and spur of the Senate majority, we are to be compelled to attend night sessions, to meet at 11 o'clock in the morning, with the hope that the pending bill may be passed by to-morrow or Thursday. The Senator from Wisconsin knows it can not pass by that time; no Senator here believes it can pass by that time; and if there is anybody in the country who thinks it can be passed by that time, he is laboring under an erroneous impression.

I violate no secret when I say that at least some of us on this side of the Chamber want to see every appropriation bill passed during the present session of Congress; we want to see the agricultural credit legislation enacted into law before the 4th day of March, and we are willing to cooperate, as we have cooperated up until this good hour and will continue to cooperate, until those two things have been accomplished. When, however, we have said that, we stop, because we are not going to cooperate with the Republican side in the effort to pass through the Senate and through the Congress a ship-subsidy proposal which we believe will increase the burden of taxes upon the American people through subsidy to a shipping trust in the amount of $750,000,000 or more. The Senators on the other side are aware of our plan. If they want us to cooperate so that we may proceed in an orderly way and pass much proposed legislation that is now on the Calendar and that is needed by various localities, that has been promised by numerous Senators, many bills could be taken up by unanimous consent and passed after brief discussion and consideration. If Senators on the other side want that, if they want cooperation to that extent, we will give it to them; but if they expect to use strong-arm methods and to hold night sessions in order to ram through this Congress a ship subsidy bill, then I tell them there will be a little trouble encountered on this side of the Chamber and I believe from certain Members on the other side of the Chamber.

When I make that statement I am not talking as a member of the Democratic Party, because if I were to speak as a Democrat I would wish the Republican majority to pass a ship subsidy proposal. I know nothing that would more inure to the benefit and advantage of the Democratic Party than to have the present administration top off the work of this Congress by passing legislation that would impose additional burdens upon our now oppressed taxpayers in the sum of $750,000,000 or $850,000,000. If that measure were passed, all the eloquence possessed by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, by the Senator from Wisconsin, and by the Senator from Washington, and all the activities and eloquence of various Members of the Cabinet could not answer for such action as that.

So my efforts against the ship subsidy bill is as an American, in order to save the taxpayers of this country from further burdens. So I say to Senators on the other side that if I would lay aside my Americanism and act merely as a partisan I would want to see them pass the ship subsidy bill; but I am not willing at this time, when the farmers throughout the country are receiving unremunerative prices for their products, when laborers' wages are being threatened with reduction, when the consuming masses are being extorted and gouged by profiteers in every city and village and hamlet throughout the country, when taxation is crowding itself day by day in increased volume upon the people, to see this outrage perpetrated when it can be prevented.

The Republican majority have done so many foolish things since they came into power that some of us would exert ourselves in order to save them from their own folly. So after the 4th of March I think I can see the Senator from Massachusetts, the leader of his party in this Chamber, and other majority Senators come over to the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], come over to my friend from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], and to my friend from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], and over to me and shake our hands, pat us on the back, and say, "Boys, I am mighty glad you did it." Why, you ought to feast us and dine us after the 4th of March for saving you from the folly of passing the ship subsidy bill.

So, Mr. President, why can we not proceed in an orderly way, and all of us get along nicely by meeting here at 12 o'clock or, if necessary, sometimes at 11 o'clock, work our six or seven hours in the day, discuss these measures as they should be discussed, pass the Army appropriation bill, as expressed by a majority of this body, pass the agricultural credits bill, pass these bills that are upon the calendar that have been promised the people, and abandon this idea of passing a ship subsidy bill at this session?

You know you are not treating the people fairly when you attempt to do it. You are not just on the level with them when you bring this bill in at this short session and try to force it to enactment. Why, you know if you had told the American people in the last campaign that you intended to follow this procedure more of you would have been lost in the catastrophe than did fall by the wayside. Why did you not tell them at the time that immediately after the election an extra session of Congress would be called and that you would propose this legislative monstrosity to add further burdens to the taxpayers of America? But you did not do it. The only hint that was given, the only suggestion that came with respect to the ship subsidy bill and an extra session of Congress, was when the Speaker of the House of Representatives, Mr. GILLET, and the leader of the Republicans in the House, Mr. MONDELL, visited the White House, held a conference with President Harding, and one of them, upon coming out of the White House, in talking to a newspaper reporter, let the cat out of the bag and said that the President was going to call an extra session of Congress.

Why, I could hear it whispered among the leaders over there, I could hear it among Republicans everywhere, that it was poor politics for the President even to think of such a thing, and they condemned the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the leader of the Republicans in the House for having given such a statement to the press, saying "That in itself will lose us millions of votes in the coming election." So through the days intervening between the publicity of that statement and the election Republican leaders and spellbinders all over the country were busy trying to repudiate those statements and raise a doubt in the minds of the American people as to whether or not the President intended anything thereby; but as soon as the election is over, with a crowd of distinguished lame ducks who have my sympathy and whom I love—they carry back to their homes and their States my fondest respect and very best wishes—I say to them, I say to you who control in this body the destinies of the Republican Party to-day, and to those at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue, that it is not fair to the American people to take the votes of Senators who have been repudiated at the polls and pass through this body a ship subsidy bill that means so much to the American shipping interest and so much to the American taxpayer. If you want to be fair with them, follow orderly procedure here; call an extra session of Congress immediately after the 4th of March, composed of new Senators, composed of Representatives of the American people fresh from the people, whose wishes were expressed to their constituents, whose views were known, and let them handle the ship subsidy bill as they will in that extra session of Congress.

No; you do not want an extra session of Congress. You do not want these new Representatives and Senators fresh from the people to deal with this question. I dare you to follow that procedure. There is not a Senator here who believes that if this proposal should be given to the new Senate and to the new House of Representatives it would stand a chance even of getting out of the Commerce Committee; and none of you think or have a thought that you could pass it through the Senate of the United States. Why, you know now that if it should come to a vote there would not be two votes difference on the measure; that if you passed it, it would be merely by the skin of your teeth, so to speak; and with a great change after the 4th of March in the personnel of this body and of the House of Representatives, you know that it would not stand any chance at all.

So I submit to you leaders over there that you should follow in the orderly way your program. Let us get through with the Army bill. Let us get through with the agricultural credits bill. Let the President take the American people into his confidence; and oh, why do not some of you advise him? Why do not some of you tell him what to do? God knows he does not know what to do, or, if he does know, he gives no evidence of it. Why do you not tell him the deplorable situation, not only in this body but in the House of Representatives and all over the country? Why do you not lay aside your flattery and go up there and say: "Mr. President, you are losing caste. You have lost the popularity that swept in a mighty wave over this country during the days of the Disarmament Conference. The folks in every State and in every part of the country have been disillusioned. They are tired of waiting on your negative, do-nothing policy. They want to be told what is going to happen to-morrow by the Government that runs affairs." Tell him how he is losing caste with the labor element, how he has lost caste with the farmers, how business is halting, and how disgusted all classes are. Tell him of some of the private things you hear here touching the management of foreign affairs and of domestic policies. Be on the square with your President. Open his eyes to the true situation, and tell him, if you will, that if he does not wait until an extra session of Congress is called to force through this last monstrosity the American people will lose all faith—and they have mighty nearly lost all faith now—in the Republican Party.

I do not want to see you disappear from view entirely. God knows I do not mind your shriveling up a little bit; but we want to have a foe that is worthy of our steel, and the way you are going down grade there will not be a respectable minority in this country to fight and withstand the onslaughts of Democracy two years from now. So, now, take the President into your confidence. Take into your confidence Mr. Lasker, who says he is going to resign if you do not pass this bill. He is not going to resign. This is the best job he ever had in the world. He likes it; but tell him the situation, and put it up to him that he should have more interest in the welfare of the Republican Party than he has in a shipping trust that wants to extort greater taxes from the people.

I have said this much in the hope that it might help you. I have given you this advice without suggestion from you and without expectation of reward, and I hope you will follow it.

Let me plead with the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and the distinguished Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], in the interest of expediting legislation, that they will agree to the request that I made. If they will, if they will just say they will, we will call a quorum, I will make again the proposal which will insure the agricultural credits bill being passed by next Tuesday night, we can then get to work on the Army bill, and we will have a good time from now to the 4th of March.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? If there is bound to be a filibuster—of course that is the right of any one under the rules—will not the Senator postpone that until after this agricultural bill is passed? Will he not consent to consider the very important amendments of which he speaks? Will he not please let us consider this bill?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I see that my remarks have had no effect at all upon the Senator from Wisconsin. He is just a hardened political sinner. He is beyond redemption. The Senator from Wisconsin is generally as fair as he is able. He made a speech yesterday—I was surprised when I read it, but I saw it in the Record this morning—and in the course of those remarks he said that there was great delay with respect to this agricultural credits bill, and he charged the delay to the farm bloc in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator is wrong about that. The statement was made by the Senator from South Dakota, who charged delay. My response was that there was delay, but the fault for delay was with the farm bloc.

Mr. HARRISON. Here is exactly what the Senator said, and it gives the impression that the fault of this delay is with the farm bloc. Here is what the Senator said:

Mr. President, I merely raise this question because of the intimation of the Senator from South Dakota, made in the utmost good faith, that somebody—he did not say who—was responsible for this agricultural credit bill being brought in at this late date. I would like to have the record straight. This bill was introduced by me more than a year ago. I secured very promptly the appointment of a subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency. On March 10, 1922, almost a year ago, I appeared before that subcommittee and argued in favor of the passage of this bill. At the request of members of the farm bloc I did not press the bill, because it was represented to me that the farm bloc were discussing the whole question of farm credit legislation and would like to have the Committee on Banking and Currency take no action until they were ready to make some report. I acceded to that, and, in view of that fact, I do not think it is quite fair to apply any criticism to me or to the Committee on Banking and Currency when, if there be anyone responsible for the delay in this credit legislation, it is the farm bloc itself; and I am not criticizing them.

Mr. President, I do not know that anybody in particular is to blame for the delay of this legislation. I am not charging that the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate is to blame. I know that the farm bloc is not to blame. I know that the Commission on Agricultural Inquiry, of which the Senator was a most influential member, was not to blame. I will tell you where the blame was—not with the Banking and Currency Committee particularly, although this matter did lie dormant for a long time, just sleeping, so to speak, and evidently they forgot about the splendid argument presented to the subcommittee by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin after he had made that argument, because then the matter lay in abeyance for quite a good long while.

Mr. President, the first suggestion as to agricultural credits legislation at this time came either from members of the farm bloc in the Senate or from the Commission on Agricultural Inquiry. The Commission on Agricultural Inquiry began work soon after the Republicans got into control of the Congress, and we studied the question and reported out a bill. There were many divergent views with respect to that legislation. It might be very truthfully said that the Commission on Agricultural Inquiry delayed the proposition, if the Senator could be correct in what he said about the farm bloc, because the Commission on Agricultural Inquiry took weeks, aye, I may say months, in order to form conclusions and write a bill; but during all that time we were having hearings, we were drawing from every part of the country experts who we believed could give us some good suggestions. We called in the head of the Federal land bank system here; we called in Mr. Meyer; we called in everybody whom we thought might aid us in coming to a conclusion with respect to the matter.

The Senator knows that we worked diligently; he said so in his speech. I agree with him that no commission ever worked more diligently than did that particular commission. They worked at night, and I think it was during the time the tariff bill was being discussed in the Senate, and many other matters were before us for discussion; but we finally agreed upon a measure and it was reported by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Is it to be said the farm bloc delayed things? The farm bloc appointed a subcommittee to work out this proposition so that the views of various Senators might be reconciled, and we could present to the full farm bloc, and in turn the farm bloc agree upon some method by which we could put the whole force of the farm bloc behind the proposition. Although the tariff was being discussed in the Senate at that time and other important matters were before the Senate, that subcommittee worked day and night. They called in witnesses from far and near, and finally they agreed that the Lenroot bill was perhaps the best bill that could be passed during this session. That subcommittee of the farm bloc, in doing that, did not discount the splendid merits of the Norbeck bill; it did not intend to discredit the splendid provisions of the Simmons bill, but it believed that we could obtain some legislation giving to the farmers an agricultural credits system by urging the passage of the Lenroot-Anderson bill, and not the Norbeck or the Simmons bill.

All the measures seek to do the same thing; all represent efforts to serve the farmers, to give to them credit for such time as will take care of their turnover from production to harvest time. I do not speak in disparagement of the Lenroot bill, because I think it is a wise proposal. I want to see some amendments made to it, but as a whole it affords a splendid system, well worked out, and one which will bring untold benefits to the agricultural interests of the country; but in my opinion the thing which moved the subcommittee of the farm bloc more than anything else to indorse the Lenroot bill, with certain modifications, was that the members of the farm bloc, as well as some other friends of the farmers in this body who were not members of the farm bloc, had crystallized public opinion in this country to the extent that some agricultural credits bill must be championed by this administration, and must be passed by Congress. That crystallization of public opinion, I say, was brought about through the activities of the farm bloc and the friends in this body and in the other Chamber of agricultural credits legislation.

The Senator who sits before me [Mr. BROOKHART] is a splendid successor to a most distinguished ex-Member of this body, Senator Kenyon, who when he was a Member of this body lifted his voice in behalf of the farmers of the country, and after he called meetings night after night of the farm bloc in his committee room and they discussed these problems meaning so much to the farming interests of the country would announce to the press what they had done, and the press of the country would carry it everywhere. In that way sentiment was crystallized for agricultural credits legislation. In my humble opinion, if it had not been for the organization in this Congress of a farm bloc little or nothing would have been done for the great agricultural interests of this country. The farm bloc forced the cooperative marketing bill through this body. The farm bloc helped in the passage of packer legislation. The farm bloc stood here as mighty champion for the people, trying to withstand assaults on the revenue laws, so that Senators on the other side would not take off the high surtaxes from the rich of the country and place them where they could be least easily borne. It was the coalition formed by Senators on this side and a few on the other side, and championed by the farm bloc, that held the surtaxes as high as they were kept, over the suggestion and against the protest of President Harding and Secretary Mellon.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. In one moment. It will not be forgotten how the Secretary of the Treasury sent his messages and reports here asking us to reduce the surtaxes from 68 per cent, I think, down to 25 per cent, and how the President brought to bear the power and influence of his office to get it down to 32 per cent; but he did not succeed, because of the farm bloc, the coalition between the Democratic forces in this body and the progressive Members of the Republican Party. Now I yield to my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I was simply going to remark that in enumerating the great benefits the farm bloc have rendered to the country, I hoped the Senator would not forget to enumerate the excessively high tariff duties levied upon raw wool, due largely to the farm bloc.

Mr. HARRISON. That illustrates one of the troubles we encounter. There has been a certain element in this country that has attempted to make the people believe that the farm bloc indorsed those conscienceless rates on wool and on sugar, and yet the farm bloc at no meeting it ever had ever considered the question of a tariff on everything. The men who for the most part conspired to put the high tariff on wool were not members of the farm bloc. Some of the influential members of the farm bloc were particeps criminis to the other proposition, but the crowd which put the high-tariff duties on raw wool was what was known as the tariff bloc, and was headed by the distinguished junior Senator from Idaho, my friend Mr. GOODING. So the farm bloc had nothing to do with that piece of legislative monstrosity.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I want to confirm what the Senator has said to the effect that there has been some misuse of the term "farm bloc." As the Senator from Mississippi has observed, the farm bloc never attempted to consider tariff matters or any party question. Afterwards some members, perhaps of what was known as the farm bloc, engineered some provisions in the tariff bill, and it got to be known as the farm-bloc movement in connection with the tariff; but it was entirely distinct and separate, and not in any wise properly lined up with what was known as the farm bloc.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Do I understand that the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING], the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD], the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], and the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BURSUM] are not members of the farm bloc?

Mr. HARRISON. I know that some of them are members of the farm bloc. The Senator omitted to state the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. He should not leave out that good shepherd.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I quite agree with the Senator. They certainly are members of the wool bloc.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; they certainly are members of the wool bloc. They are all wool and a yard wide. So much for the tariff bloc and the farm bloc. They are distinct and different entities.

I say that the farm bloc was the one that crystallized public sentiment in this country for agricultural credits legislation. Are we to be blamed now for delaying two or three days, say, so that we can adequately discuss the agricultural credits bill, when we know it is going to pass, a bill we are all in favor of, though some of us want to put amendments to it, when 12 months or more ago the Senate, controlled by the same leadership that now controls it, worked here for months to consider and have passed the tariff bill, a measure laying greater burdens on the people, while this one is to relieve the people of many burdens; yet there was no enthusiasm upon the part of the leadership on the other side during those long days that the tariff bill was being discussed in order to force an agricultural credits bill through at that time.

This bill would not now be considered in the Senate, and everyone who hears me knows it; it would have no chance in the world to be passed if it had not been that the President became aroused over the interest among the public for agricultural credits legislation. Indeed, he did not become aroused until the late election was held, and when the ides of November rolled around, and he saw this friend laid on the table, and this friend laid on the shelf, and he saw my friend from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], seeing the breaker coming, get on the boat and sail across the placid waters of the Atlantic, cabling as he went away what would happen the next day to the Republican Party—it was only when the President saw those things that he became alive to the issue, and wanted some agricultural credits legislation. The first time the President ever hinted at any legislation for the farmers was in his message on the ship subsidy bill. He devoted about 55 minutes to a ship subsidy measure, to give to the shipping interests all these subsidies at the expense of the people, and two lines, which my friend Eugene Meyer evidently persuaded him to put in, touching agricultural credits legislation.

By the time the Congress convened in the regular session he had become wiser. Some of the members of the farm bloc had obtained an entrée to the White House. They had poured into his ear some of the things the farmers of the great Middle West were saying about the Congress and the administration. He listened to their admonitions, and then it was that he incorporated in his message an urgent request for agricultural credit legislation. Why did he not do that way back yonder when the agricultural inquiry commission had made its report, when the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] had originally introduced the bill? If he had desired to do something for the farmer, that was the time. The tariff bill should have been laid aside and agricultural credits discussed then. Yes, Mr. President, everyone knows that it was the farm bloc that forced the hand of the President and caused him to make the request of Congress to enact agricultural credits legislation.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the Senator remember that more than a year ago the President called an agricultural conference which met in Washington? Does not the Senator remember the President's speech to that conference?

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator repeat his question? I did not hear him clearly.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the Senator remember that more than a year ago the President called an agricultural conference to meet here—

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, I was just coming to that. I am glad the Senator suggested it. It shows the importance of the part of the speech I am now going to make.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I hope the Senator will not overlook the fact that the present administration has substituted for a "watchful waiting" policy a "happy, hopeful" policy.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; that is what our friend William Allen White said—a happy, hopeful policy instead of a watchful waiting policy. I do not know just how a fellow would feel if he was in a happy, hopeful way. He looks perfectly happy. He is sitting there with the whole world filled with uncertainty, threatened war all around us, discontent in this country, and yet he is supposed to be the watchman on the tower, but assumes a hopeful attitude. Then all of a sudden he becomes happy over this hopeful attitude. Not suggesting anything, not planning anything, not conferring with those in authority around him to arrive at a policy, yet in all this mess and mass of discontent our President assumes a happy, hopeful attitude.

So that is the compliment that is paid to the President by a distinguished Republican from the State of Kansas. I do not see my friend, the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], now in his seat. He probably thought I was going to talk about William Allen White and left for that reason. "Happy, hopeful attitude!" Ten thousand times better is it for a President to assume a watchful waiting attitude than a happy, hopeful attitude.

Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] recalled to my mind an agricultural conference that was called in Washington, which the President addressed. One of the things said about that conference was the lack of applause and commendation through the crowd over one expression used by the President at that time. That expression was carried by the press all over the country and was read by the farmers of Iowa and Kansas and the other Western States. It was the expression employed by the President condemning the farm bloc of the United States Senate. Oh, they reported the coldness that enshrouded that meeting when he let loose his invective and condemnation of the farm bloc.

That, it will be recalled, was only a little while after Secretary of War Weeks had spoken at a banquet in New York City, a banquet that was attended by national bankers in large part and by the great manufacturers of that great metropolis. He was in his atmosphere there. He was among his friends in that gathering at that time. Oh, will you men from the agricultural West ever forget what Secretary of War Weeks said against the farm bloc and the members of the farm bloc? If you ever forget, how will you explain to your constituents, when you go before them two years from now, with reference to what he said against legislation that was forced through the Congress by the farm bloc?

That is the treatment the farm bloc gets at the hands of the administration. Not until its work was displayed throughout the country and sentiment crystallized was it that the President came to Congress and recommended the enactment of agricultural credit legislation. His attitude in this particular is a good deal like his attitude when the great Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] offered his resolution to call a disarmament conference. At first the President stood adamant. He said "no." The wires were busy from here to the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. Leaders on the other side of the aisle talked to him and held up the provision in the naval appropriation bill. For weeks we talked. On this side of the Chamber we were lined up solidly for the Borah resolution. A few progressive Republicans on the other side stood side by side with the great Senator from Idaho.

Finally the country became aroused. They saw taxes piling up. They saw the heavy armaments being constructed. They read and saw for themselves that the naval appropriation bill in 1912 carried only $160,000,000, while in 1922 it was $560,000,000. They saw that in 1912 the Army appropriation bill carried only $100,000,000, while in 1922 it had risen to $350,000,000. So they became aroused.

The press of the country began to carry editorials. They brought pressure to bear on the President, and then he threw up the white flag and surrendered and sent word down to the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and the distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], "Let it pass, boys, let it go through." From that day on the President was carrying the flag and the Secretary of State was trailing behind, both claiming all the credit for the disarmament conference. The disarmament conference has come and it has gone. Nobody knows now whether any country has ratified any of the treaties except the United States.

Thus it goes. Of course, we were led to believe then that taxes were going to be reduced, and yet the naval appropriation bill passed during the present month carried practically three times as much as the naval appropriation bill carried in the preparedness days immediately preceding the war when the highest amount was $160,000,000. We have had reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, notwithstanding the disarmament conference, an appropriation bill carrying for the Army $350,000,000, over three times as much as during the preparedness days immediately preceding the war.

Thus it is and thus it was that the President came to advocate agricultural credits legislation, and yet the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] chides us and says that the farm bloc was the cause of a great deal of delay.

Mr. President, I do not know that it is necessary for me to talk any more about the subject. I do not know just what is before the Senate. I think the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] has a motion pending?

Mr. McNARY. That is correct.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. McNARY that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 11, 31, 33, and 35 and recede from its amendment numbered 34 to the bill (H. R. 13481) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desired to discuss the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] some two hours ago, but the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] got me off on another proposition. I shall now proceed to discuss the motion. When I was diverted I was about to discuss a speech that was made yesterday by the President of the United States. I had read the latter part of that speech where he expressed gratification over the fact that various men in the Government service had cooperated with him in a reduction of the estimates.

I was about to read, when I was interrupted, that part of the speech where the President had impliedly condemned the Senate for its attitude recently when we offered on the floor of the Senate amendments that had merit, but which did not have the sanction of the Bureau of the Budget and which had not been estimated for. I want the distinguished Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], who is now in the Chamber, to listen to me particularly when I read this part of the President's address. The President said:

It is the endeavor of the President to present to Congress calls for funds that are sufficient, and no more than sufficient, to carry out approved policies.

It is the duty of the President to estimate for those that are sufficient, said the President.

The Budget and accounting act places no limitation upon the power and right of Congress to increase or decrease estimates submitted—

Said the President.

This is in accord with the spirit of our institutions, and as it should be.

Mr. President, that reads like the eloquent speeches the President once made to the Senate when he talked about the dignity of the Senate and protested against Executive encroachment. Again, he gives utterance to the expression that the Senate has the right and should exercise the function that is imposed by the Constitution of the United States. The President proceeded:

It is my hope and expectation that, as the Budget procedures develop, the estimates transmitted to Congress will be so carefully prepared and will present so accurate a picture of the real operating needs of the Government as materially to lighten the burden. But it is not expected or desired that Congress should relinquish any of its prerogatives regarding public funds—prerogatives so wisely given to the people's representatives by the founders of the Government.

So the President in those utterances first concedes the right of the Congress to increase appropriations over the estimates of the Budget, and then he admonishes the Congress that we have certain rights, that we are the representatives of the people, and that we should pass upon the matter. But he said in his speech that he assumes responsibility for the estimates and that the estimates he has given are those which in his opinion are based upon facts.

Let us see, Mr. President. Of course, in accordance with the law creating the Budget Bureau, the President has the power to reduce the estimates, but he delegates that power to certain representatives of the Budget Bureau. The President is too busy a man, he has too many duties, to look over the various estimates of all the departments of the Government. So it is natural and necessary that he should delegate that function to some one else. But in delegating that power he should know the character of the men to whom he has delegated it; he should acquaint himself with their fitness and their peculiar qualifications to perform the work. Has he done so? He is responsible for what these men do, for when they prepare the data and submit them to him he transmits them to Congress, and upon such information the Congress must act.

Under the antiquated rules of the Senate, Senators on the floor are prevented from offering an amendment proposing to increase the amount carried in an appropriation bill over the estimate which has been submitted by the Budget Bureau. That makes it so much more necessary and so much more important that the President should choose the right kind of men to go over the estimates and to submit them to him.

It would be a strange system of government indeed if, under the Budget system, there should be delegated to investigate the affairs of the Agricultural Department, for instance, and to prepare the estimates for that department, a man who is well versed in bookkeeping, who is well versed in the operations of a stock exchange in New York, who has thorough knowledge of the administration of a hotel in Chicago or elsewhere, but who knows nothing in the world about agriculture.

Indeed, if the President should adopt such a course under the Budget system, and the lack of qualifications of the Budget official should come to his knowledge, he would receive the condemnation instead of the praises of the American people. If he charged with the duty of examining the estimates for the War Department some person who was not qualified to do that work, some person who had never seen a cannon or a gun or a standing army, who knew nothing about the needs of an army, Senators would criticize him; everybody would find fault with him. If he should delegate to go into the Navy Department and look over the estimates prepared by the Navy experts and cut those estimates some man who knows nothing about the Navy, who never saw a battleship or a submarine, who had never been trained in that line of work, indeed, the President would rightfully receive the criticism of everybody.

So in the case of the Department of Commerce. The men who are delegated to examine the appropriations which are needed for the Department of Commerce and for the Department of Labor and for the various other branches of the Government ought to be men specially trained and qualified and fitted to pass on the estimates for those various departments, so that the President may transmit correct estimates to Congress. But what has been done? What has been the practice? Has the President sought men who are especially qualified to do that work? No.

Take the Agricultural Department, for instance, which has to do with an occupation which in this day and time should appeal more strongly to the President than any other. Why? Because wheat has gone down, corn has gone to a low price, the price of live stock is low; everything practically that the farmers of the country have produced in recent years has depreciated in value. The purchasing power of the farmer's dollar to-day is only about 70 cents, compared to what it formerly was; indeed, the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar to-day is lower than the purchasing power of the dollar of any man who is engaged in any other occupation in the country. So I say that, in view of the conditions confronting the American farmer, with his need for markets abroad, with his necessity for an adequate credit system at home, with increased prices for the products which the farmer has to buy, some consideration should be accorded to him. The President should have seen that General Lord delegated some one to pass on estimates for the Agricultural Department who knew what the needs of agriculture were, so that the appropriations for agriculture might not be cut to the bone.

What was done? It is a matter of history now that last year a man who had been the manager of the Hotel La Salle in the city of Chicago; a man who had been an Army officer; who was not raised on a farm; who, perhaps, did not know whether a potato grew under the ground or on a tree, was delegated to revise the estimates which were prepared by the experts of the Agricultural Department. Then, he began to slash them without a program and without a policy, without rhyme or reason, until he had cut them about $2,500,000. General Lord did not go over the Agricultural Department estimates, but he appointed some other man to go over them. It is all in the testimony. That man so designated took the figures and told the Secretary of Agriculture, or Doctor Ball, who was delegated by the Secretary of Agriculture to prepare the estimates for the department, that he wanted them cut about $2,000,000. Those estimates had been prepared with great care, and with an idea to economize to the last degree; aye, they had been cut to such an extent that they were then some $500,000 less than the appropriations which had been carried in the last agricultural appropriation bill; yet this man, whose name I do not now recall, delegated by the Budget Bureau to cut the estimates, served notice that they must be reduced $2,000,000; so they were cut something like that, and the estimates which were prepared finally and agreed to by the Budget Bureau carry less, and considerably less, than the appropriations carried in the agricultural appropriation bill for last year.

The President, in his address yesterday, delivered through the Vice President, said, in substance: "We have given to Congress those things that they need; we have cut where the estimates should be cut." Then he thanked the various heads of the departments for cutting as they did. Let us look over the appropriations intended for the benefit of the farmers of the country. I am not going to discuss the Army appropriation bill; I am not going to call attention to the cut made by the Budget Bureau and approved by the President for the Army for the coming year; I am not going over the estimates prepared by the naval authorities and approved by the Budget Bureau for the Navy; I am not going to take up the appropriations for the Department of Commerce or for the Department of Labor, or for various other branches of the Government service, but I am going to take up the estimates for the Agricultural Department and one other matter, namely, river and harbor appropriations, which mean so much to the agricultural interests of America.

Now let us see the cut that the President of the United States, who now poses as a friend of American agriculture, has recommended; this President who now tries to force through the agricultural credits bill, but who did nothing for at least a year to ask Congress to pass an agricultural credits bill, who did not lift his voice or hand until public sentiment was aroused, as I said before, by the farm bloc.

Taking the items for the Agricultural Department, I will consider first the appropriation for extension work. Under that appropriation agents are sent throughout the country to try to instruct the farmers as to the best methods of farming. Under the same appropriation are employed demonstration agents, women as well as men, who go out to instruct the little boys and little girls to can fruits and vegetables, or to raise corn or to inoculate hogs, or to protect crops against insect pests and animals against diseases. The activities of the county agents and demonstration agents mean so much to the farmers of the country. They have saved millions and millions of dollars by the preservation of hogs, the eradication of tuberculosis from cattle, the destruction of insects of various kinds, helping the farmers to adjust conditions in their various localities so that they may prosper or, at least, live under the abnormal conditions which confront them; yet in the case of this important service of the Government, with people everywhere crying for it, demanding greater appropriations and showing that the needs are greater, the President suggests to Congress a reduction in this amount from $1,300,000 to $1,250,000. Oh, yes, he wanted to save $50,000 to the taxpayers of the country, but how? By cutting it off this needed appropriation to carry on the work of maintaining county agents and demonstration agents in this country. Thus it is again manifested how the Bureau of the Budget and the present administration are favorably disposed toward the farmers of the country.

Now let us take another item, and I am just picking the items out piecemeal, for I merely wish to bring to the attention of the Senate the situation. I want the farmers of the country to know, when it comes to cutting appropriations, that the cut is made in appropriations for their interest and not in those designed for a big Army and a big Navy and other appropriations devoted to Government work along other lines.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I think the Senator ought to be fair in this matter. The facts have previously been called to his attention, and he knows what they are, and that the statements he is making are not sustained at all by the record.

In the first place, there never was a hotel man dictating appropriations for the Department of Agriculture. When General Dawes was put in charge of the Budget, he called to his assistance a number of business men from all over the country to visit some of the departments and study their expenditures. It happened that a hotel man from Chicago was sent to the Department of Agriculture, and stayed there for two or three weeks, studying the expenditures of the Agricultural Department. It is known to the Senator—it has been stated to him frequently—that every department has a Budget officer. The Agricultural Department has in the department its Budget officer, who has been with the department for years. He is still there. The Senator knows, because it was called to his attention before, that when the estimates were sent in by the heads of the departments to the Budget, the Budget concluded that the Government could be run with less money than had been asked for by the heads of the various departments; and the heads of the departments were not directed to take from this or that item, but the heads of the departments were asked to go over their estimates and reduce them so as to bring them within the recommended amount. That request went back to the head of the department, was referred to the Budget officer of the department, and the Budget officer concurred in the estimate that was finally sent in. The Senator knows all that; and yet this is the second or third time he has gotten up here and made statements that would indicate that some different plan was followed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. He is very courteous and very kind. It so happened that I was a member of the subcommittee that framed the Agricultural bill last year. I do not know whether the Senator was or not. I never heard it denied, because the record speaks for itself, that last year—

Mr. CURTIS rose.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield before I proceed.

Mr. CURTIS. I will state to the Senator that I am not a member of the subcommittee that has charge of the agricultural appropriation bill, and I am not a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; but when the Senator made his statement before I took the pains to call up the department, and wanted to know from the head of the department what the facts were, and I was given the information that I have given the Senate to-day.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator had been a member of the subcommittee he would not have made the statement he has just made. I am sorry the Senator fell into this error, because usually he does not state a thing unless he is absolutely sure of it. This is not his usual course. Last year—and it is in the Record—they were just trying out the Bureau of the Budget, just beginning; and General Dawes or General Lord, I do not know which—I think it was Dawes—

Mr. CARAWAY. Anyway, it was some Army officer that would not know a cow from a horse if the cow had been deborned.

Mr. HARRISON. It is very true, as the Senator says, that the Bureau of the Budget designates some one in the Bureau of the Budget to take up the estimates with the various departments and go over them. First, for instance, the Agricultural Department is supposed to get up its estimate, and then this representative of the Bureau of the Budget calls on the Agricultural Department, and they go over the matter together with any suggestions that the representative of the Bureau of the Budget may make. We agree thus far. The man that was designated by the Bureau of the Budget last year to go to the Secretary of Agriculture, or to those in charge of the estimates for the agricultural appropriation bill, was a man who was employed at the Hotel La Salle as manager.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, that is just what I stated a minute ago. I stated that he was a hotel man, selected from Chicago.

Mr. HARRISON. We do not differ, then, so much.

Mr. CURTIS. I stated that, and he was there three weeks.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. That is not disputed.

Mr. HARRISON. We are getting together, then.

Mr. CURTIS. But what I want the Senator to know is that neither that man nor any other man in the Budget fixed the amount of any item in this appropriation bill. The total was requested to be reduced to a certain extent. The Budget notified the heads of the departments what the reductions must be, or what they would like to have them, and then the Budget officers in every department made the recommendations themselves to the Budget, and then the estimates came to the House of Representatives, where under the law they must be presented.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator agrees with me about this manager of the Hotel La Salle, then.

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, I stated that, as the Senator would know if he had been listening. The difficulty with the Senator is that he makes statements and then does not listen to the answers.

Mr. HARRISON. The trouble is you never say anything.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it would be better for the Senate if other Senators said less.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the way with a reactionary Republican. He believes that. They want to slide something through here without the people getting onto it, but we have to let them know about it.

Now, getting back to this matter I was discussing, we are mighty near together. So last year this manager of the Hotel La Salle was appointed to go down to the Agricultural Department, and he did, and that is all I stated awhile ago. He went over the list, and he told them to cut the total over $2,000,000. He was the man that had the Agricultural Department change its estimate. This year it is quite different. This manager of the Hotel La Salle was put on some other work. Evidently they found that he had bungled the estimates for the Agricultural Department last year and he was not the same man that was designated to go to the Agricultural Department this year.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield for another statement, that shows that the Senator did not listen. The statement was made that General Dawes had asked business men from over the country to come here, volunteer their services, and study the estimates and the expenditures in the different departments. This man was not regularly employed in the Government service. He is not now and has not been, as I am advised, since that time.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, they ought to pay somebody and get a competent man, instead of allowing a manager of the Hotel La Salle to go down there and cut these estimates of the Department of Agriculture. I thought the fellow was on pay, a servant of the Government; and yet we find that General Dawes permitted a man who knew nothing about agriculture, who was to work for nothing, to go down there and cut the estimates. That is the system that we are called upon to accept; so there is not any difference between my good friend from Kansas and myself with respect to that matter.

I was going to read from the testimony to show that the manager of this hotel was the man delegated by the Bureau of the Budget to look over the Agricultural Department's estimates, and I am going to do it anyhow.

Senator HARRISON. Who had charge, on the part of the Director of the Budget, of the preparing of the estimates?

Doctor BALL—

He was representing the Department of Agriculture—

Doctor BALL. A gentleman whose name I can not at the moment remember—Stevens, I believe it was—the manager of the La Salle Hotel.

Senator HARRISON. Stevens?

Doctor BALL. Yes.

Senator HARRISON. He was the manager of the La Salle Hotel in Chicago?

Doctor BALL. The manager of the La Salle Hotel. He was also a director in General Dawes's bank, I believe.

Senator HARRISON. Was he an experienced farmer?

Doctor BALL. No; not at all.

Senator HARRISON. How long did he work on these estimates?

Doctor BALL. Probably about 10 days.

Senator HARRISON. Did he cut it throughout?

Doctor BALL. I never saw his exact figures, but about $750,000.

Senator HARRISON. Was he the only one that worked on it on behalf of the Budget?

Doctor BALL. No; after he left he made his report to the Director of the Budget; and then General Mosley, who was the general assistant to General Dawes, went over the entire Budget again and made a further report.

Senator HARRISON. How much reduction did General Mosley make?

Doctor BALL. His reduction was the sum that I quoted.

Senator HARRISON. Seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars?

Doctor BALL. No; $2,400,000, altogether.

Senator HARRISON. Why did General Mosley go over it after this other employee of the Director of the Budget had gone over it and checked it?

Doctor BALL. Because it had not reached the sum, I think, that was satisfactory to the Budget Bureau.

Senator HARRISON. But I understood you to say that this clerk at the Hotel La Salle—

Doctor BALL. He was the manager of the La Salle Hotel.

Senator HARRISON. This man who had been manager of the La Salle Hotel I understood you to say had made his report to the Director of the Budget, and in his report he had cut the estimate approximately $750,000, and following that the director ordered General Mosley to go over it?

Senator OVERMAN. And cut it $2,400,000.

Doctor BALL. Yes.

Senator HARRISON. And he cut it further?

Senator OVERMAN. No; he was instructed to go over it and cut it $2,000,000, as I understood Doctor Ball to say yesterday.

There is the hearing on the proposition; and yet my good friend from Kansas becomes aroused here and disputes with me about a fact that finally we both agree about, and which the testimony shows we were both correct about.

Mr. President, my good friend from Kansas is one of the most adroit Senators I ever saw. I am sorry he is not here now. When we get to showing things up, and when the shoe begins to pinch, the Senator from Kansas seeks to divert us, as it is said that a bear, when pursued, will throw aside its young in order to escape and divert the attention of the pursuers. So, when I was proceeding to show how these various estimates for various lines of agricultural work had been cut by the Bureau of the Budget on the approval of the President, he tried to divert me from my line of talk, and brought up this Hotel La Salle manager.

I showed you the facts about the extension work. Let us take another matter. There is not anything that kills cattle quicker and is more injurious than a tick. They may not be indigenous to all sections of this country, but I know that in the section from which I come ticks sometimes infest the cattle, and they kill them, and work great injury and loss to the farmers of that section. So we must eradicate the tick, and heretofore we have carried in the appropriation bills very reasonable appropriations for that work. It was extended year by year, and so sections that once were infested by the tick have now become tick free, and these cattle, once tick ridden, now can be sent to market throughout this country, and it is due in large part to the splendid appropriations that have been made by the Congress for tick-eradication work; and yet what do we find in the bill now pending? The Agricultural Department recommended $660,000, and the President approved what the Bureau of the Budget said was needed, and he says in his speech that is all they need. They cut the $660,000 to $500,000. Yes; they are economizing by lopping off $160,000 of an appropriation that is necessary to rid the cattle of a certain section of this country of the tick, because they want through this Lasker bill to give that small amount over to the shipping trust of the country. Why, the way Lasker is managing things, that $160,000 will not buy a stack for one of these boats that the Shipping Board has, and yet they are economizing with the great agricultural interests of the country!

That is not all. Let us consider the dairy industry. I do not know what the figures are. My friend the distinguished Senator from North Dakota might tell me; but I know that the dairy industry of this country is immense. It runs into hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars. It is confined to no section of the country. In some degree at least it pours wealth into the pockets of the farmers and the dairymen around the great city of New York and the great city of Philadelphia, the same as it does to the farmers out near Minneapolis and Chicago. All over the country we have a dairy interest, and we need it.

Experiments in the dairy industry have been undertaken by the Government ever since the Department of Agriculture was organized. The Government has been liberal in appropriations in the past to carry on experiment work for the dairy industry. Yet, under this administration, under this economizing spell, which catches the farmer and catches almost no one else, we find that for experiments in the dairy industry there was estimated by the Department of Agriculture $375,000. The President in his budget recommends $284,320 as all that is necessary, a cut of nearly $100,000 against continuing the plans for experimentation in the great dairy industry of the country.

Let us go further than that. I did not know this thing was so big; I had no idea that the farmer had been treated so badly; I had no idea that this Congress and the President and the Budget Bureau would to such an extent disregard the necessities of the agricultural classes, until I began to look over this list to see where the knife of economy had cut the farmer; but it did not scratch any other industry in this country.

I need not call to the attention of the Senate how disastrous hog cholera is. When hogs get cholera they die like sheep, meaning millions of dollars of loss.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator mean like sheep with cholera?

Mr. HARRISON. No; the Senator from New York was writing a letter to some constituent, and he did not catch what I said. The cattle and the hogs and the sheep and all the stock would die if it were left to the nurturing hand of this administration to take care of the wants of agriculture.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator tell the Senate and the country how much better the Democratic administration took care of the wants of agriculture?

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad the Senator asked me that question. During the eight years that Wilson was President of this country there never came an appeal from the great West, or the North, or the South affecting the farmers' interests that he did not gladly heed and recommend to the Congress the passage of relief legislation.

Mr. LENROOT. Which party—

Mr. HARRISON. I have not finished answering the Senator. He asked me a question, and then does not want me to answer it. It takes me a long time to answer that question.

Mr. LENROOT. I observe that.

Mr. HARRISON. But I hope the Senator will be patient with me. The list of splendid achievements of the Wilson administration in behalf of the farmers of the country is so long that I hesitate to enter upon a discussion of it. I shall never forget when I came in as a Member in the Sixty-second Congress. At that time we were in the majority, and my friend from Wisconsin was then a Member of that august assembly, and a very live Member, too. He used to criticize everything that the majority wanted to do, and I know that in those days the influence of the distinguished Senator was hard for me to withstand. I sometimes feel like criticizing the majority myself, but I withhold my criticism—I have to restrain myself—but it was the habit the Senator from Wisconsin got into which almost led me astray when we got into the majority.

The Senator remembers that the first thing the Democratic Party did when we came into control of the House was in the interest of the farmers of the country. He has asked me the question, and I want him to listen to my answer. The first piece of legislation we championed was in the interest of the farmer; and yet he now asks me that question, as I parade this list of reductions in the appropriations for the agricultural interests before him. I know it makes him feel badly. I believe they did not know they treated the farmers as badly as they did, or they would not have done as they did by the passage of this bill.

The first legislation we passed was known as the farmers' free list bill. Before that the farmers had been compelled to buy their implements, buy the barbed wire for their fences, buy their gunny sacks, buy cloth in which to wrap their cotton, and buy 10,000 other things necessary to conduct a farm and the operation of the farm from the tariff-protected trusts. We removed the tariff from all those articles and placed them upon the free list. It was the first time in the history of this country that we had passed a tariff bill friendly to the great farming interests of the country.

We did not stop there. The next legislation we passed, as the Senator will recall, because he voted for it—and there were some others over there who voted for it—was to establish the Federal reserve banking system, when we wrote into the bill, with the help of the Senator from Wisconsin, the provision that allowed the member banks of the Federal reserve system to discount agricultural paper, the first time in all our history that the farmer had received an opportunity to discount his paper and get credit thereby.

We went down the list, passing what was known as the Lever agricultural extension act. I could enumerate piece after piece of legislation intended to promote the interests and welfare of the farmers enacted into the law during the Wilson administration, and never during the consideration of any agricultural appropriation bill were the estimates of the Agricultural Department cut below the needs of agriculture. Indeed, the Secretaries of Agriculture approved the estimates made by the experts from the Agricultural Department; they came to Congress, and committees and Congresses, dominated by a Democratic majority, passed them, giving to the great Department of Agriculture all that they needed and all that they could show was necessary.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. Were those appropriations larger or smaller than the appropriations in the Agricultural appropriation bill just passed?

Mr. HARRISON. My recollection is that they were about the same as the appropriations in this one.

Mr. LENROOT. How does it happen, then, if this is such a discrimination against the farmer, with everything costing so much more now, that the Democratic Party did not make larger appropriations?

Mr. HARRISON. One of the reasons is that the barberry bush had not been discovered up in Wisconsin, and the demands would not come in from the Senator's State and Minnesota for some $650,000 to eradicate the barberry. I can cite instance after instance where insects injurious to agriculture have been discovered since that time. That is what we make appropriations for, to enable the department to send men out to try to find such insects and pests and to get some solution for diseases which kill cattle and injure stock.

It is natural, as the population of the American Republic gradually increases, that the appropriations for agriculture should constantly be enlarged, and I am sure, with the logical mind of the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, he would not assume for a minute that the Agricultural appropriation bill would gradually get smaller in amount, but he knows that if it keeps abreast of the times and takes care of the constant demands and needs of a great and growing country the appropriations will continue to increase within certain bounds.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the Senator know that the bill we just passed carries out that very policy?

Mr. HARRISON. This bill carried $200,000 less, if I recall the figures correctly, than the one we passed last year. I know the Budget cut the estimates. There is not much difference between them. I am not taking into account the appropriation carried for good roads.

Again I am diverted when I am proceeding in an orderly way. When the boot begins to pinch some Senator rises and tries to befuddle me so that I can not make my argument.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield? The Senator has been making a purely political speech here, and I hope he will welcome some facts.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator knows there is no politics in this.

Mr. LENROOT. Let me read the appropriations made for agriculture under the Democratic administration as compared with the Republican. In 1913 the Democratic Party appropriated for agriculture $16,600,000; in 1914 they appropriated $17,986,000; in 1915 they appropriated $19,865,000; in 1916 they appropriated $22,971,000; in 1917 they appropriated $24,850,000; in 1918 they appropriated $25,920,000. Then the Republicans came into power. In 1919 they appropriated $27,887,000; in 1920 they appropriated $33,899,000; in 1921 they appropriated $31,712,000; and the bill just passed carries about $33,000,000, more than double the appropriations made for agriculture by the Democratic Party when it came into power.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if there is anything in the world that would convince any man of ordinary common sense that the Democratic Party was a more economical party than the Republican Party, it is the statement just made by the Senator from Wisconsin.

I have shown that every estimate made by the Department of Agriculture for the needs of the farming interests of the country was immediately and adequately provided for in appropriations by a Democratic Congress. The appeals which came from the farmers were transmitted by the Agricultural Department to the Congress, and we gave them all they asked; yet we showed such magnificent economy in the management of the situation that the Senator himself cites figures which show the great saving to the American taxpayers when compared to the bill just passed.

Mr. LENROOT. Will not the Senator please make a statement which he himself believes? He certainly does not believe any such wild statement as he has just made regarding Democratic "economy." The word is not found in the Democratic dictionary.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, I knew the Senator would talk that way, but we think we did things pretty well. About the only fellows who have been indicted by this administration for malfeasance in office were Republicans who were appointed by the Democratic administration.

Mr. LENROOT. Not those appointed by Republicans.

Mr. HARRISON. That shows that the Department of Justice is very fair and is not playing politics, as my friend from Wisconsin is. I am trying to make a real, constructive, statesmanlike speech, and the Senator says I am talking politics. I have not investigated, for the purpose of comparison, the agricultural appropriations that were passed by the Democratic Congresses and those passed by the Republican Congresses. I do know one fact which is fundamental, that we did take care of the needs of agriculture, and there was no politics in it. There has never been any politics in the appropriations for agriculture.

There is not any now. I am talking against the system here, if you please. I know that certain Senators on the other side of the Chamber are just as friendly to the farmers and want to take care of their needs as much as those on this side.

But I am trying to bring to the attention of those on the Republican side of the Chamber the fact that there is in force a system that works against the interests of the agriculturists of the country. There may have been provisions in agricultural appropriation bills carrying large amounts that were not wholly for agricultural purposes; I do not know. I know that in the present bill we provide large amounts for the Atlantic watershed, as I believe it is called. I know that we carry quite a large amount for roads in this bill—I think about thirty-odd million dollars.

Mr. McNARY. Twenty-nine million dollars, but that is not included—

Mr. HARRISON. I understand, but there are many things carried in the bill that are not wholly for agriculture. So it is natural that the amount carried in the bill as a whole should change year by year. The Senator knows that in the passing of the years the agricultural appropriations will constantly increase, as they should increase. So there is really nothing in the amount, but I do know the amount has been cut in this bill. The Budget did it and that is what I am calling to the attention of the Senate.

Now, let us go further. I was discussing plant diseases. When we think about the great peach and apple orchards, the pecan groves, and the orchards and groves of every kind in which we constantly find new insects and new diseases and new pests that the department never knew about before, we realize that we need appropriations to look immediately into the situation and to eradicate the pests and eliminate or cure the diseases. The Department of Agriculture of all departments should know what is needed to do that work. They estimated for $182,000. What was given them? The Bureau of the Budget, whose action meets the approval of the President, gave only $77,000. Thus it is that that important work will be curtailed to at least $100,000. That is the way Republicans economize.

But that is not all. There is another provision for diseases of the orchard. The Agricultural Department estimated $113,935 for that purpose. The Bureau of the Budget cut it to $111,000. Thus it is that on the two items affecting diseases of the orchards the amounts have been cut $125,000, not enough under Lasker's administration of the Shipping Board to purchase one plank to help repair one of the ships.

With reference to cotton diseases, Mr. President and Senators, if you knew of the horrible situation in the cotton-growing section of the country, if you knew what they have had to contend with, if you knew the effect on the industries of this country as well as the effect in other countries, you would not want to economize in an appropriation to eradicate or eliminate diseases and pests that are destructive of cotton. The boll weevil, that made its appearance some years ago, wrought millions, yea, I might say billions of dollars of damage to the cotton planters of the South, working so disastrously in my State that fields which had previously produced over a bale of cotton to the acre were so affected that they could not raise one-tenth of a bale of cotton to the acre, forcing the farmers to allow hundreds of thousands of acres of the finest cotton lands on God's green earth to lie idle. I have seen the destructive effects of it in my own State. I have seen it, where we once raised over a million bales of cotton a year, drop until we raised hardly half a million bales of cotton a year.

In the State of Georgia, represented in part by my distinguished friend, the junior Senator from that State [Mr. GEORGE], where they once raised as much as two million bales, I believe, this year they estimate about 800,000 bales of cotton. I have seen the ravages of the boll weevil working its way through South Carolina, where they once raised 1,600,000 bales or more a year, and yet this year the Government estimate is that they will produce a little more than 500,000 bales. I have seen the pink boll weevil, as it came up from Mexico, working its injury in the boll of the cotton in Texas and on into Louisiana, destroying the prospects of the farmers and ravaging their fields. These things have caused the cotton crop to decrease until last year it had dropped to a little over 7,000,000 bales, and this year I think the Government estimate is 9,700,000 bales.

So, there will be in this country a shortage of cotton that can not be supplied to the world for at least two months of the coming summer. They need the cotton. They need it to compete with the high prices of wool and other goods. They need it for the warmth of the American people as well as the people everywhere. Yet with that situation and condition, we see the estimates of the Agricultural Department, desired to fight the cotton diseases, cut from $127,000 down to $117,000.

Now, let us see what else. Here is an item for crop plants. Land that once produced nothing has, under the magic hand of some progressive truck farmer, been brought to produce truck crops that fill the wants of the great cities of the country with cheap cabbage, cheap tomatoes, and cheap vegetables of every kind. Diseases have worked their way into those crops and very often destroyed them. As the crop is affected by a pest or an insect or a disease, so is the price of that particular vegetable or commodity increased to the American consumer. In this day and time, when the high cost of living has soared so that the American people can hardly make ends meet, I wonder how the man of family on a small salary can get along at all. God knows I do not see how he can exist with things as high as they are.

All these economic conditions and questions should be taken into consideration in making up an appropriation bill affecting the great agricultural interests of the country, and yet, with vegetables and other necessities of life needed in the great cities of the country, we see the estimates of the Agricultural Department for the work on crop plants reduced from $66,860 to the pitiful sum of $55,000.

Now, what would $11,000 do in maintaining the proposed subsidized merchant marine? How far would it go in promoting the Lasker scheme for a ship subsidy? It would help very materially the farmers of the country who are affected by the different diseases in their truck crops, and yet the Congress says, with the President's approval, "We will withhold that $11,000; we will not give it to stamp out disease in truck crops, but we will give it over to the great shipping interests of the country, because they need it." That is the Republican idea of the way the Government should be run.

God bless you, you Republicans will have a lot to answer for when you get away from here on the 4th of March. You Republicans did not consider the force of the suggestion I made this morning. If you would go ahead and have the President call an extra session of Congress, we could stay here all this spring and summer fighting out the ship subsidy bill, and you would have a good excuse for not going back home to face your people. The people could not see you then. It is going to be mighty hard for some of you to face your constituents after the 4th of March. You will wish then that you had followed my suggestion about an extra session of Congress.

What explanation are you going to make to the man who raises a little truck crop, say, some lettuce that he must cover up at night with cloth, where he must build fires around the hotbeds and coldframes in order to keep the lettuce warm, so that the wintry winds and cold blasts from the north will not destroy it. The man who has planted his tomatoes out in the field, where they seem to be growing nicely under the kiss of the spring sun, hears the squeedunk blowing. It can be heard for miles and miles. Then one farmer says to the other, "What is that?"

There the farmer says, "That is the warning. That is the squeedunk over yonder that is blowing. They have a report from Washington, and the report is that a cold wave is coming." Then the farmers begin to go out in the field and cover up tomato plants or other vegetables. They work late into the night. They build fires to create warmth to ward off the wintry blast. But the cold comes and their crops are destroyed.

Those men undergo all the vicissitudes of a changing climate. They have to fight everything, with no great insurance companies to write a policy insuring that their crop will come out 100 per cent. There is no insurance company to underwrite a policy that they will be protected against cold or disease or insect or injurious pest. The only help they have is not the happy hopefulness of the President—no; not that, but they have the hope that here in Washington, where they have two Senators and a Congressman, they will be able to pass an appropriation bill every year which will in a small way make allowance for taking care of their crops, providing a little appropriation to fight the diseases which infest truck crops. And yet when you go home and meet that little truck farmer you will have to explain to him why you and your President reduced the Department of Agriculture estimate from $66,860 to $55,000. If you think that you can give him an excuse to justify the proposition that that was needed in the ship subsidy appropriation, just try it out on him. That is what you are trying to do here. Here I have brought upon my head censure from the distinguished junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] because I would have the Senate wait until next Tuesday to pass the agricultural credits bill. He wants to whip it through here by to-morrow night; he only wants 10 minutes to be allowed for the discussion of each amendment. I can not believe that he does not want the bill "framed" after full and adequate consideration; but it is because he is so anxious and other Senators on the majority side of the Chamber are so anxious to force the ship subsidy bill upon the American people. I can not believe that Senators on the other side knew when they voted to reduce the appropriation for investigating and improving truck crops and to fight diseases and pests and insects affecting such crops $11,000 that they really intended for the money merely to go to the shipping trust; and yet that is what their actions here mean if we allow the ship subsidy bill to pass.

Mr. President, I will refer to two other items. One is for the improvement of cereals. Is there anything that we should work more diligent upon than to try to improve the quality and increase the production of cereals in this country? Is there anything that could be brought more directly to the home life, to the fireside, to the breakfast table, and to the dinner table than to improve the quality as well as increase production of cereals?

The Agricultural Department through years have been prosecuting this work, and they have performed a great service. This year the Agricultural Department's estimate for this work was $42,440. Yet the President of the United States approves the estimate of the Budget Bureau and Congress approves it, reducing the amount to $32,000. There is an instance where cereal improvement can wait, but the shipping interests must be taken care of. It is argued that, though it is a small amount, it will help some.

The Agricultural Department estimated $180,000 for the improvement of crop production, but the Budget Bureau cut it to $169,000. Again the farmers of the country are economized upon.

For horticultural investigations the Agricultural Department estimated $79,440, but the Budget Bureau estimates bring it down to $71,940.

Mr. President, I shall not read the entire list, though I could cite other instances to the Senate. However, it does no good here. I talk, and I plead, but it seems that Senators on the other side of the Chamber are callous to any suggestions I make or to any appeal which I may utter.

Worse than all—and we are now about to vote—the Senator from Oregon makes a motion here which will put the finishing touches to this conference report. I procured—and I thank the Senate for it—an increased appropriation, against the suggestions of the Budget Bureau, of $50,000 for the destruction of the sweet-potato weevil. I thought it was necessary; indeed, I know it would have been most helpful to the section from which I come. The sweet-potato crop in five States along the Gulf coast is valued at $135,000,000.

Under this appropriation in the last few years we have been able to eliminate the sweet-potato weevil in many of the counties and in some of those States, but it is a pest which, unless we shall continue every effort to restrain its march, will go on from State to State and enlarge the field of its operations. I am quite sure that the inadequate appropriation carried in this bill will mean millions of dollars of injury to the farmers who must combat the sweet-potato weevil; but I have done my best; I can do no more. Under our system of Government, under the peculiar method in which we pass legislation through Congress, I know that no matter how long I might speak and what I might say I could not defeat, indeed, I would not defeat, the report carrying the appropriations for agriculture in this country. There are so many good provisions in the legislation; so many necessary provisions in the bill that I, of course, would not attempt to defeat the conference report merely because the Senate conferees receded on my amendment.

I shall not say, for some one might imagine the discussion to be sectional, that it is peculiarly strange that the appropriation for the corn borer which was increased by amendment in the Senate was retained in the bill. The corn borer has ravaged the corn fields of New England; it has greatly affected the corn crop in that section. I believe that the amount appropriated for its destruction, which includes the increased amount which the Senate provided, is necessary in order to fight the corn borer, and I would not say anything against it for fear that what I should say might be misinterpreted; but the increase in the appropriation to combat the sweet-potato weevil was eliminated, while the amendment increasing the appropriation to combat the corn borer was retained.

I would not say anything as to other amendments increasing appropriations over those recommended by the committee, notably the one to exterminate the barberry bush. I shall bide my time with patience, hoping that next year, when the Agricultural appropriation bill shall again be under consideration, and the Senate committee considers it, care will be taken to provide an adequate appropriation for the destruction of the sweet-potato weevil.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gooding	McKellar	Shortridge
Ball	Hale	McLean	Spencer
Brookhart	Harris	McNary	Stanfield
Bursum	Harrison	Nelson	Sterling
Calder	Heflin	New	Sutherland
Cameron	Johnson	Nicholson	Swanson
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Norbeck	Trammell
Caraway	Kellogg	Norris	Underwood
Colt	Kendrick	Oddie	Wadsworth
Curtis	King	Overman	Walsh, Mass.
Ernst	Ladd	Page	Walsh, Mont.
Fernald	Lenroot	Phipps	Watson
Fletcher	Lodge	Pomerene
George	McCormick	Reed, Pa.
Glass	McCumber	Shields

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] are detained from the Senate because of their duties in connection with the work of conference committees on appropriation bills.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. WILLIS] because of serious illness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce the absence from the Chamber of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on account of the oil hearings before the Committee on Manufactures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY].

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let us have the motion stated. We may want to divide the question, if it can be divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The motion pertains to the message from the House, and is that the Senate agree to the House amendments to the Senate amendments numbered 11, 31, 33, and 35, and recede from its amendment numbered 34.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from Oregon what disposition was made by the conferees of the appropriation of $6,000,000 plus for roads and trails in Government forests?

Mr. McNARY. I will state to the Senator from Utah that we arrived at a disagreement. That was one of the items presented here to-day for either confirmation or instructions to insist upon the Senate amendment. I am informed that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] will make a motion at this time that the conferees insist upon making the whole amount, namely, $6,500,000, immediately available for the construction of forest roads, rather than the House provision that only $3,000,000 shall be made immediately available.

Mr. KING. As I understand, if I may be pardoned, the House appropriated $6,000,000 directly—

Mr. McNARY. Six million five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. KING. Six million five hundred thousand dollars, to be immediately available, for roads and trails within the national forests.

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. KING. The conferees have abandoned that, and have agreed upon $3,000,000 to be immediately available, and power is given the Secretary of Agriculture to enter into contracts for the expenditure of the other $3,500,000.

Mr. McNARY. The action of the Senate was to the effect that $6,500,000 should be immediately available. In conference we disagreed, and the House comes back with this provision making $3,000,000 immediately available, $3,500,000 to be carried in a deficiency bill, and authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to allocate among the States the $3,500,000 not made available; also to contract with respect to it. That is not satisfactory to some of those who are interested in the roads in national forests, and the Senator from Arizona intends to make his motion at this time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I just want to correct one impression that the Senator from Utah apparently has. The House did not appropriate $6,500,000 and make it immediately available.

Mr. KING. No; $3,000,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Three million dollars; and the Senate appropriated $6,500,000 and made it immediately available.

Mr. KING. If I indicated as the Senator states, I did not intend to convey that impression.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33 and ask for a further conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, for this reason:

There are 29 States that have a large forest area. There has been withdrawn in these 29 States a forest area of 156,837,282 acres of the public domain. That area is not taxable at this time. In order to make the Forest Service self-sustaining or in order to derive from the Forest Service the benefits that the Government ought to derive these areas should be properly taken care of in the way of development. Roads and plenty of them should be built, thus tapping the timber belts and other natural resources which are now of little use and hardly appreciated. Under the appropriation of June 19, 1922, section 2 and section 4, we are entitled under that bill this year to $6,500,000. The House saw fit to cut the $6,500,000 to $3,000,000. The Senate committee put it back to the original amount $6,500,000, and the conferees stood up for the $6,500,000. It is necessary now, in order to get this $6,500,000, to disagree to the House amendment, and I ask the Senate, after a most careful consideration of this appropriation and close study of the situation, to send this amendment back for a further conference. That is the reason of my motion at this time, and I hope the Senate will see the great public need of this full appropriation so these forest areas can be properly developed as now outlined through the program of the forestry department.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I should like to inquire of him what was the recommendation of the Budget with respect to the item for roads within the national forests?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I can answer that question, with the Senator's permission. The Bureau of the Budget recommended an authorization of $6,500,000, due to a past act authorizing the appropriation of that sum of money, but making immediately available $3,000,000. The act passed some years ago, when the road work was in the hands of the Post Office Department, authorizing the appropriation of $6,500,000 for this year. This legislation is in fulfillment of that authorization, passed in 1921, and as brought to the House it was in response to the estimate of the Director of the Budget.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I think I understand the Senator. He spoke of "this year." Did he refer to the fiscal year 1924?

Mr. McNARY. The year commencing 1923, to 1924.

Mr. KING. That is, beginning with the 1st of July, 1923, and ending with the 30th of June, 1924?

Mr. McNARY. Yes; that is it.

Mr. KING. Was there any antecedent legislation that restricted the Congress of the United States to an appropriation of only $6,500,000 for roads and trails in the national forests?

Mr. McNARY. A bill was passed in 1921 providing for the expenditure of certain sums in the national forests in the years 1923, 1924, and 1925. The $6,500,000 was the amount authorized to be expended in 1923-24; and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, of course, could not go back of the authorization that had been sanctioned by prior statutes, but made available $3,000,000 upon the theory that that was all the money they could use, but that they had a right to contract for the balance, namely, $3,500,000.

Mr. KING. Then he was acting upon the assumption that those who were charged with the duty of expending the entire amount could not advantageously contract for and expend this $6,500,000 for roads and bridges and trails in the national forests in the space of 12 months?

Mr. McNARY. I will not say that. It was uncertain, perhaps, whether or not they could expend all the sums; but the point was simply this: A great many of those interested in the roads in national forests wanted the whole amount—namely, $6,500,000—made immediately available, so that these small contractors would feel justified in entering into contracts, knowing thereby that they would receive their money and could get the proper credits at the banks. That was the position of the Senate conferees. The House conferees, however, argued that if they made $3,000,000 available the balance could be carried in the deficiency bill, as it was subject to contract rights. As a compromise, the House proposed to make immediately available the $3,000,000, and to specify that the Secretary of Agriculture can contract for the balance of the $3,500,000, and also to direct him to allot among the various States the remaining sum of $3,500,000. That is not satisfactory to some of those interested in the forest roads, and that is the reason of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. KING. It seems to me the Senator from Arizona is entirely right. He is fortified by the law, fortified by common sense, and fortified, it seems to me, by legitimate and wisely accepted business policies. If we are to construct these roads, the men charged with the responsibility know best how to expend the money, and the very reason suggested by the Senator from Oregon—namely, that the small contractors want to know that they can get their money when they enter into their contracts and when they do the work, without having to wait for subsequent appropriations—would justify, and not only justify, but, it seems to me, demand that the Senate adhere to the position it took when it made immediately available the $6,500,000.

I shall be very glad, therefore, to support the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. May I inquire what is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the pending question.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The motion made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] was that the Senate agree to the House amendments to Senate amendments Nos. 11, 31, 33, and 35, and recede from its amendment No. 34. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] has now moved that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 33, and insist upon its own amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. I submit, merely as a matter of parliamentary procedure, that the motion of the Senator from Arizona is not in order until the pending motion of the Senator from Oregon is disposed of, a motion to agree being preferential over a motion to disagree, it bringing the two Houses together on the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin if his position is that the question can not be divided?

Mr. LENROOT. No; we can divide the question and vote upon the motion to agree, but of course voting it down would be equivalent to disagreeing; but a motion to disagree, as the Senator well knows, is not preferential over a motion to agree.

Mr. KING. The Senator insists that the proper parliamentary procedure would be to agree or to disagree to the report of the conferees?

Mr. LENROOT. If there is a motion pending to agree, that has preference, of course.

Mr. KING. And if we should vote to agree, being satisfied with all the residue of the report, that would cut off the item that is under consideration now and prevent the matter being sent back to conference?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly; but a separate vote can be had upon this particular item, of course.

Mr. KING. That is what I had reference to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I do not want to stand in the way of the Senator from Arizona having a free expression of the Senate upon his amendment; and I should like to know, if I should withdraw the motion that I have made, whether the motion of the Senator from Arizona would be in order?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that he modify his motion so as to move to agree to all of the amendments that he desires to agree to, except the one in question, and that will leave the matter open for the Senator from Arizona to make his motion.

Mr. McNARY. I think that would be preferable.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In other words, it is proposed to strike from the original motion the numerals "33."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to say just one word about the motion to recede from the amendment No. 34. I have examined the debate in the House, and I am satisfied from the situation there that it would be utterly useless to send that amendment back to conference. Therefore I shall vote for the motion to recede.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon, leaving out amendment numbered 33.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before that motion is voted upon I shall be glad to learn from the Senator from Oregon what the other items are and exactly what will be the result of the affirmative vote for which the Senator now asks.

Mr. McNARY. One appertains to the provision of maximum salaries of the scientific employees of the Secretary of Agriculture. The only difference between the Senate amendment and the action of the House is that the Senate inserted the word "hereafter," making it permanent law. The House has modified it to make it apply during the fiscal year 1924. The other is simply a reenactment of the provision, now extant in the statute, permitting the shipment from a State where lumber is cut to some other State in the Union. The other is the recession from the seed item and the bean item.

Mr. KING. Respecting the timber item to which the Senator refers, as I understand the Senator, if the amendment agreed upon in this report prevails, then timber which is cut from forests by permission may be transported from one State to another?

Mr. McNARY. Yes. In the old law there is a prohibition against cutting timber in one State and shipping it to another, upon the theory that the State where it is cut should have the use of the timber for its consumption. That was found to be impracticable, and timber cut on the public lands, or in the national forests of Utah, under this provision could be shipped to another State.

Mr. KING. That is a very wise provision, because the Senator knows that there are many instances where the timber cut near some boundary line between two States is not available at all in the State in which the timber is growing, and is only available across the line in some other State. The Senate recently passed a bill permitting the exportation to Utah or other States of timber cut upon the reserves in Arizona, for instance, because in the Arizona strip, as it is called, there are few, if any, inhabitants, and the timber there is of no value whatever. I am very glad of the position of the Senate upon that item.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the modified motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The motion as modified was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona now moves that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, that the Senate insist upon its amendment and ask a further conference with the House on the disagreeing vote thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. McNARY, Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. SMITH conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

ACTION ON PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, in the Sixty-sixth Congress the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] introduced a proposed amendment to the Constitution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That Article V of the Constitution of the United States is hereby amended to read as follows, to wit:

"ARTICLE V.

"The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution when ratified within six years from the date of their proposal by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, or by the electors in three-fourths thereof, as the mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided, That no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

This amendment was reported favorably from the Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

We have had 19 amendments to the Federal Constitution. I will treat the first 10 amendments as a part and parcel of the original Constitution, because when the Constitution was ratified it was upon the distinctly implied, in some cases expressed, understanding that amendments would be adopted. They were proposed and submitted by the First Congress on the 15th of September, 1789. They were 12 in number. The third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth were ratified by the required number of States within exactly two years and three months. But No. 1 and No. 2 are still pending, and on the 15th day of next September will have been pending 134 years.

So we perceive a wise suggestion in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut that there should be a time limit. Moreover, we have precedent. Congress, in submitting the prohibition amendment, laid a limit upon the time within which the States could ratify.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the last nine amendments have been brought about by "amendment periods." The eleventh and twelfth amendments were adopted in the 10-year period between 1794 and 1804, the twelfth having been brought about by the unfortunate tie in the Electoral College between Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr. Call that the first amendment period. Then, notwithstanding the fact that many scores of amendments were introduced in Congress and two were proposed between 1804 and 1864, no amendment was adopted; thus there was a 60-year period of immobility with respect to amending our Federal Constitution.

Then came the second amendment period, which began in 1865 and lasted until 1875. In that 10-year period the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments were proposed and adopted.

Then came another period of nearly 40 years of immobility, and then came the sixteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth amendments—the third amendment period, 1909 to 1923—showing that these amendments move in cycles.

The Federal Constitution conserves and protects all that real Americans hold precious; it should not be changed by legislative caucus but by the direct vote of the people.

There is not a State in the Federal Union whose constitution may be amended by the State legislature. The various State constitutions may be amended only by the electorate of the State. How utterly archaic, therefore, it is to deny the electorate an opportunity to express itself upon the proposed change in our fundamental law.

If the consent of the voters be required to alter and amend a State constitution, a fortiori the vote of the people should be required to change the Federal Constitution.

It is vital to our American system that the voter should have an opportunity to say at the ballot box what form of government he desires to live under.

If you are not willing that the State legislatures should choose United States Senators, for a much stronger reason the State legislatures should not change your fundamental law.

Every argument in favor of the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people is a stronger argument in favor of consulting the people on constitutional amendments.

I favored the amendments providing for the income tax, direct election of Senators, prohibition, and woman suffrage. I believe they were wise amendments, and that they were in response to the deliberate judgment and progressive thought of a vast majority of our countrymen; indeed, I believe those amendments were demanded by the people and were not forced upon the people. My belief, unfortunately, does not settle the question, for the stubborn fact exists that millions of our countrymen thoroughly believe that the prohibition and woman-suffrage amendments were adopted by cunning, by craftiness and indirection, and that the Congress and the State legislatures were either browbeaten into voting for the amendments or were induced to do so by an insidious lobby. It is my opinion that if a referendum to the people on the prohibition and woman-suffrage amendments could have been had, each amendment would have been adopted and ratified by the electors. We should, therefore, take the requisite steps to preclude the opportunity in the future of a recurrence of such discontent and suspicion by providing a means by which the electors of each State may pass upon amendments to the Federal Constitution.

Mr. President, there are 435 Members of the House of Representatives and 96 Members of the Senate, in all 531. I ask unanimous consent to include in the Record, as a part of my remarks, a statement showing the number of State senators, number of members of the house or assembly, as the case may be, in the State legislatures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Number of members in State legislatures according to the year 1919.

State.	Senate.	House or assembly.
Alabama.....	35	106
Arizona.....	19	35
Arkansas.....	35	109

Wyoming.....	27	57
	1,760	5,643

Members of senate.....	1,760
Members of houses of assembly.....	5,643
Total.....	7,403

Mr. ASHURST. So we have a total of 7,403 members of the State legislatures, according to the figures for the year 1919. Not two-thirds but a bare majority of that 7,400 men may pass upon an amendment to the Constitution.

We find ourselves in this posture: Two-thirds of the Congress and a majority of the 7,400, or about 4,500 men, pass upon the destiny of the most advanced people that ever lived in the tide of time. We set ourselves up as the leader among the nations in thought and as responsive to the people's will, and yet 4,500 men, if they saw fit, could Prussianize the Republic.

Mr. President, it is startling to investigate and then reflect upon the perils that have come and that in the future may come by a continued failure to set a time limit within which a proposed amendment may be ratified.

Four different amendments duly proposed by the Congress are now pending before the States for their action. These amendments are as follows:

One, proposed September 15, 1789, 134 years ago, relating to enumeration and representation:

ARTICLE I. After the first enumeration required by the first article of the Constitution there shall be one Representative for every 30,000 until the number shall amount to 100, after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that there shall be not less than 100 Representatives, nor less than one Representative for every 40,000 persons, until the number of Representatives shall amount to 200, after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that there shall not be less than 200 Representatives, nor more than one Representative for every 50,000 persons.

Another, proposed September 15, 1789, 134 years ago, relating to compensation of Members of Congress:

ART. 2. No law varying the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives shall take effect until an election of Representatives shall have intervened.

Another, proposed May 1, 1810—113 years ago—to prohibit citizens of the United States from accepting presents, pensions, or titles from princes or from foreign powers:

If any citizen of the United States shall accept, claim, receive, or retain any title of nobility or honor, or shall, without the consent of Congress, accept and retain any present, pension, office, or emolument of any kind whatever, from any emperor, king, prince, or foreign power, such person shall cease to be a citizen of the United States, and shall be incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under them, or either of them.

Another, proposed March 2, 1861—62 years ago—known as the Corwin amendment, prohibiting Congress from interfering with slavery within the States:

No amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere, within any State, with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State. (12 Stat. 251.)

I think the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] took a bold and progressive step recently when he introduced his proposed constitutional amendment granting to the people the right to vote upon amendments.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator mentioned a moment ago the ratification of the Constitution in the early days. I ask for information. My recollection is that most of the legislatures of the 13 Colonies—or many of them, at least—were elected with reference to the Constitution, so that the people had the right to choose—

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is correct. Conventions in most instances were called and the question submitted was the ratification of the convention of 1787. In the case of Virginia I presume that never on this continent has there been assembled in one State more learning and wisdom than was assembled in the Virginia convention which ratified the Federal Constitution, and after a debate which lasted many days and was participated in by the leading statesmen of Virginia the Federal Constitution was ratified by 10 majority.

On September 15, 1789, 12 constitutional amendments were proposed by the First Congress. The requisite number of States ratified proposed articles numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12 within exactly two years and three months, whilst Nos. 1 and 2, although proposed 134 years ago, have not, according to the latest available returns, received favorable action by the requisite number of States and are yet before the American people, or the States, rather, have been for 134 years, and are now subject to ratification or rejection by the States. After those two proposed amendments, to wit, Nos. 1 and 2, had been in nubilus—"in the clouds"—for 84 years, the Ohio State Senate in 1873, in response to a tide of indignation that swept over the land in opposition to the so-called "back-salary grab," resurrected proposed amendment No. 2 and passed a resolution of ratification through the State senate. No criticism can be visited upon the Ohio Legislature that attempted to ratify the amendment proposed in 1789, and if the amendment had been freshly proposed by Congress at the time of the "back-salary grab" instead of having been drawn forth from musty tomes, where it had so long lain idle, stale, and dormant, other States doubtless would have ratified it during the period from 1873 to 1881.

Thus it would seem that a period of 134 years, or 84 years, within which a State may act is altogether too long, and I will support a proposition limiting the time to 6, 8, or 10 years within which a State may act under a particular submission, so that we will not hand down to posterity a conglomerate mass of amendments floating around in a cloudy, nebulous haze, which a State here may resurrect and ratify and a State there may galvanize and ratify.

We ought to have homogeneous, steady, united exertion, and certainly we should have contemporaneous action with reference to these various proposed amendments. Judgment on the case should be rendered within the ordinary lifetime of those interested in bringing about the change in our fundamental law. Final action should be had while the discussions and arguments are within the remembrance of those who are called upon to act.

There is still another reason why a time limit should be set: When the 12 amendments were submitted in 1789 there were only 13 States. Vermont had not been admitted, if I remember correctly.

Question: Should three-fourths of the States then in the Union or three-fourths of those now in the Union be the test as to what shall be the number required for ratification?

The amendment proposed on May 1, 1810, was submitted to the States under the most interesting and peculiar auspices that ever came before a legislative body, and was as follows:

If any citizen of the United States shall accept, claim, receive, or retain any title of nobility or honor, or shall, without the consent of Congress, accept and retain any present, pension, office, or emolument of any kind whatever from any emperor, king, prince, or foreign power, such person shall cease to be a citizen of the United States and shall be incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under them, or either of them.

What was the reason for that proposed amendment? History does not disclose, but the reason was that when officials accept presents of great value they dissolve the pearl of independence in the vinegar of obligation.

Unfortunately, the annals of Congress and contemporary newspapers do not give any of the debate upon this interesting proposition. The only light thrown upon the subject by the annals is the remark of Mr. Macon, who said "he considered the vote on this question as deciding whether or not we were to have members of the Legion of Honor in this country." What event connected with our diplomatic or political history suggested the need of such an amendment is not now apparent, but it is possible that the presence of Jerome Bonaparte in this country a few years previous, and his marriage to a Maryland lady, may have suggested this measure.

An article in Niles's Register (vol. 72, p. 166), written many years after this event, refers to an amendment having been adopted to prevent any but native-born citizens from being President of the United States. This is, of course, a mistake, as the Constitution in its original form contained such a provision; but it may be possible that the circumstances referred to by the writer in Niles relate to the passage of this amendment through Congress in regard to titles of nobility. The article referred to maintains that at the time Jerome Bonaparte was in this country the Federalist Party, as a political trick, affecting to apprehend that Jerome might find his way to the Presidency through "French influence," proposed the amendment. The Federalists thought the Democratic Party would oppose it as unnecessary, which would thus appear to the public as a further proof of their subservency to French influence. The Democrats, to avoid this imputation, concluded to carry the amendment. "It can do no harm" was what reconciled it to all.

That amendment was submitted 113 years ago, and it was ratified within two years by Maryland, Kentucky, Ohio, Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Vermont, Tennessee, Georgia, North Carolina, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire. It was rejected by two or three of the States. At one period of our national life the school-book histories and the public men stated that it was a part of our organic law, because in the early days of our Government the Secretary of State did not send messages to Congress announcing ratification or promulgate to the public any notice whatever as to when an amendment became a part of the Constitution. I have caused the journals, records, and files in the Department of State to be searched, and there may not be found any notice of any proclamation or promulgation of the ratification of the first 10 amendments to the Constitution. The States assumed—it was not an unwarranted or violent assumption—that when the requisite number of States had ratified an amendment it was then and there a part of our organic law.

When the War between the States began to throw its shadow over the land, men rushed here and there with a compromise to heal the breach, if possible, and tried to avert the shock that was apparently about to come to our governmental structure. Expedient after expedient was proposed, and just before the adjournment of Congress—to wit, on March 2, 1861—the following amendment, known as the Corwin amendment, to the Constitution of the United States was proposed to the States, and it read as follows:

No amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere, within any State, with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State. (12 Stat. 251.) Proposed by Congress March 2, 1861.

That amendment was proposed by Congress on the 2d of March, 1861, and I warrant there are not 5,000 people in the United States to-day who know that such an amendment is now pending before the various States of the Union for their ratification. The amendment was ratified by the State of Ohio and by the State of Maryland through their legislatures and by the State of Illinois in 1862 by a convention.

Thus we perceive that a system which permits of no limitation as to the time when an amendment may not be voted upon by the State is not fair to posterity nor to the present generation. It keeps historians, publishers, and annalists, as well as the general public, constantly in doubt.

Having searched closely as to whether there is in the Constitution itself any expressed or implied limitations as to when an amendment may not be adopted, I am driven irresistibly to the conclusion that an amendment to the Constitution, once having been duly proposed, although proposed September 15, 1789, could not be recalled even by the unanimous vote of both Houses, if the Congress wished the same recalled, because the power to submit an amendment is specifically pointed out; but no power is given to recall it, and silence is negation.

I am not without authority on this subject, and I shall include in the Record some data I have collected on this subject.

Along this line, though it may be academic, I think it ought to go in the record, when an amendment is once submitted Congress has no power to recall it. Congress obtains its power solely from the Constitution. There is power to submit, but no power to recall. Hence, I reach the conclusion, and I believe it is a logical, inevitable conclusion, that those amendments which were submitted so long ago are still pending. If defeated, when were they defeated? They are still pending. But in respect to a State, the State may ratify an amendment and recall that ratification if before its final ratification the required number of States have not ratified.

That is in grave doubt. Many Senators and a great many others dispute the right of a State, after it has ratified, to withdraw its ratification. But I think the best opinion, the most matured thought, is that a State has a right to withdraw its ratification, provided the required number of States have not theretofore ratified, and provided further that the action of the State withdrawing the ratification does not change the result. Of course, after a State legislature has rejected a ratification, it may the next day or the next week or at any other time vote again; it may vote every day if it wishes; that is entirely within the discretion of the State legislature. But I notice that the amendment proposed by the able senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] proposes to clear away that doubt, and I think that is wise. It proposes in terms that the State shall have the right to withdraw its assent at any time before the required number have ratified. Am I correct?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ASHURST. In other words, the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York would clear away that doubt and statesmen and others would be no longer in doubt as to whether a State could or could not withdraw its assent.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to ask if he has noted the comparatively recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States relating to the action of the Legislature of Ohio and of the people of Ohio who voted at a popular referendum on one of the recently submitted amendments. My recollection is, and I will stand corrected if I am mistaken, that the Legislature of Ohio, when it had submitted to it one of the last two amendments proposed, ratified it, although at that moment there was pending before the people of Ohio a referendum on the same subject. The people of Ohio voted down the proposal which the legislature had ratified. It was part of the law of Ohio that a matter of that sort could be submitted by the legislature to the people for a direct vote. The Supreme Court held, however, that the referendum held under the laws and constitution of the State of Ohio had no force and effect and that, the legislature itself first having ratified, that constituted a legal ratification, thereby the will of the people being absolutely thwarted and ignored.

Mr. ASHURST. I recall that circumstance. In other words, no matter if the State of Ohio or of New York or any other State should at the polls unanimously reject a proposed amendment, if the legislature should ratify it by a bare majority of one in each house, that would be a constitutional ratification, because it is beyond the power of the State now to ratify a constitutional amendment other than by the method provided in the Constitution.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As I understand, the Supreme Court holds that the term "legislature," as contained in the article of the Constitution providing for amendments, means the legislative body elected by the people of the State.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is correct.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The most restricted possible definition.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is correct.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And we can not include the people of a State as a part of the legislative machinery.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is entirely correct. If a State should abolish its legislature and resort to what we call the initiative to initiate laws and the referendum to pass upon them later, that State before it would be an eligible entity to pass upon an amendment to the Federal Constitution would have to set up some chosen body of men called its "legislature"; otherwise it would be impotent and powerless to pass upon a constitutional amendment.

At this juncture, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the Record some copious data on this subject showing by what vote and when the various constitutional amendments were ratified. It will not take over half a column of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DISCUSSION OF CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS INVOLVED.
(Jameson.)

SEC. 585. VI. Two further questions may be considered: (1) When Congress has submitted amendments to the States, can it recall them? and (2) How long are amendments thus submitted open to adoption or rejection by the States?

1. The first question must, we think, receive a negative answer. When Congress has submitted amendments, at the time deemed by itself or its constituents desirable, to concede to that body the power of afterwards recalling them would be to give to it that of definitely rejecting such amendments, since the recall would withdraw them from the consideration of the States and thus render their adoption impossible. However this may be, it is enough to justify a negative answer to say that the Federal Constitution, from which alone Congress derives its power to submit amendments to the States, does not provide for recalling them upon any event or condition, and that the power to recall can not be considered as involved in that to submit as necessary to its complete execution. It therefore can not exist.

2. The same consideration will, perhaps, furnish the answer to the second question. The Constitution gives to Congress the power to submit amendments to the States; that is, either to the State legislatures or to conventions called by the States for this purpose, but there it stops. No power is granted to prescribe conditions as to the time within which the amendments are to be ratified, and hence to do so would be to transcend the power given. The practice of Congress in such cases has always conformed to the implied limitations of the Constitution. It has contented itself with proposing amendments, to become valid as parts of the Constitution, according to the terms of that instrument. It is therefore possible, though hardly probable, that an amendment once proposed is always open to adoption by the nonacting or nonratifying States.

The better opinion would seem to be that an alteration of the Constitution proposed to-day has relation to the sentiment and the felt needs of to-day, and that, if not ratified early, while that sentiment may fairly be supposed to exist, it ought to be regarded as waived and not again to be voted upon unless a second time proposed by Congress.

SEC. 586. In discussing the question of the right of the States to vote upon proposed amendments at any time after the date of their proposal it is proper to look into the consequences of such a right. If they have the right, there are now floating about us, as it were, in nebulous, several amendments to the Constitution proposed by Congress which have received the ratification of one or more States but not of enough to make them valid as parts of that instrument. Congress could not withdraw them, and there is in force in regard to them no recognized statute of limitations. Unless abrogated by amendments subsequently adopted, they are, on the hypothesis stated, still before the American people to be adopted or rejected.

In 1873 the Senate of Ohio, acting upon the theory that once proposed an amendment to the Constitution is always open to ratification, adopted a joint resolution ratifying the second of the 12 amendments submitted to the States by Congress in 1789, but then rejected, providing that "no law varying the compensation of Members of Congress shall take effect until an election for Representatives shall have intervened." This resolution, prepared by Madison, was an excellent one; but suppose it had been unjust, proposed, perhaps, in the interest of a section or of a party, and, failing at the time to receive the requisite majority, it had subsequently by a concerted rally of those interested in its adoption been carried without discussion or a clear expression of the existing public will; is that a true construction of the Constitution which may be followed by so dangerous consequences? And, supposing the right referred to exists, by what majority shall the resurrected amendments be adopted? If proposed in 1789, when the States numbered but 13 and when a majority of 10 States might have ratified the amendment, how many would have been requisite in 1873, when there were 38 States which would have been called upon to vote? If the answer should be that 29 States must have voted to ratify, since that number was three-fourths of all the States in 1873, however reasonable such an answer might seem, it would be founded upon no statute or custom of the country, and therefore different opinions as to its reasonableness might well be entertained. Hence the danger of confusion or conflict. We discuss this question here merely to emphasize the dangers involved in the Constitution as it stands and to show the necessity of legislation to make certain those points upon which doubts may arise in the employment of the constitutional process for amending the fundamental law of the Nation. A constitutional statute of limitation prescribing the time within which proposed amendments shall be adopted or be treated as waived ought by all means to be passed. (Jameson, John A. A treatise on constitutional conventions (4th ed., 1887), pp. 634-636).

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES PROPOSED BY CONGRESS BUT NOT RATIFIED BY THREE-FOURTHS OF THE STATES, COLLATED BY SENATOR ASHURST.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

After the first enumeration required by the first article of the Constitution, there shall be one Representative for every 30,000 until the number shall amount to 100; after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that there shall be not less than 100 Representatives nor less than 1 Representative for every 40,000 persons, until the number of Representatives shall amount to 200; after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that there shall not be less than 200 Representatives nor more than 1 Representative for every 50,000 persons. (1 Stat., 97.) (Submitted at the same time as those which became part of the Constitution as amendments 1 to 10.)

Proposed by Congress September 15, 1789.

Ratified by the following States:

New Jersey, November 20, 1789. (Senate Journal, p. 199, 1st Cong., 2d sess.)

Maryland, December 19, 1789. (Senate Journal, p. 106, 1st Cong., 2d sess.)

North Carolina, December 22, 1789. (Senate Journal, p. 103, 1st Cong., 2d sess.)

New Hampshire, January 25, 1790. (Senate Journal, p. 105, 1st Cong., 2d sess.)

Virginia, October 25, 1791. (Senate Journal, p. 30, 2d Cong., 1st sess.)

Pennsylvania, September 21, 1791. (Senate Journal, p. 11, 2d Cong., 1st sess.)

Vermont, November 3, 1791. (Senate Journal, p. 98, 2d Cong., 1st sess.)

Pennsylvania had first rejected the proposed amendment March 10, 1790.

Rejected by Delaware January 28, 1790.

The Journals give no record of the action of the Legislatures of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Georgia.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

No law varying the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives shall take effect until an election of Representatives shall have intervened. (1 Stat. 97.) (Submitted at the same time as those which became part of the Constitution as amendments 1 to 10.)

Proposed by Congress September 15, 1789.

Ratified by the following States:

Maryland, December 19, 1789. (Senate Journal, p. 106, 1st Cong., 2d sess.)

Delaware, January 28, 1790. (Senate Journal, p. 35, 1st Cong., 2d sess.)

Virginia, December 15, 1791. (Senate Journal, p. 69, 2d Cong., 1st sess.)

Rejected by New Jersey, November 20, 1789 (Senate Journal, p. 199, 1st Cong., 2d sess.); New Hampshire, January 25, 1790 (Senate Journal, p. 105, 1st Cong., 2d sess.); Pennsylvania, March 10, 1790 (Senate Journal, p. 39, 1st Cong., 2d sess.); New York, March 27, 1790 (Senate Journal, p. 53, 1st Cong., 2d sess.); Rhode Island, June 15, 1790 (Senate Journal, p. 110, 1st Cong., 2d sess.).

The Journals give no record of the action of the Legislatures of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Georgia.

TITLES OF NOBILITY.

If any citizen of the United States shall accept, claim, receive, or retain any title of nobility or honor, or shall, without the consent of Congress, accept and retain any present, pension, office, or emolument of any kind whatever, from any emperor, king, prince, or foreign power, such person shall cease to be a citizen of the United States and shall be incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under them or either of them. (2 Stat. 613.)

Proposed by Congress May 1, 1810.

Ratified by the following States:

Maryland, December 25, 1810.

Kentucky, January 31, 1811.

Ohio, January 31, 1811.

Delaware, February 2, 1811.

Pennsylvania, February 6, 1811.

New Jersey, February 13, 1811.

Vermont, October 24, 1811.

Tennessee, November 21, 1811.

Georgia, December 13, 1811.

North Carolina, December 23, 1811.

Massachusetts, February 27, 1812.

New Hampshire, December 10, 1812.

Rejected by New York (senate) March 12, 1811; Connecticut, May session, 1813; South Carolina, approved by senate November 28, 1811, reported unfavorably in house and not further considered December 7, 1813; Rhode Island, September 15, 1814.

AMENDMENT ABOLISHING OR INTERFERING WITH SLAVERY PROHIBITED (COWIN AMENDMENT).

No amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere, within any State, with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State. (12 Stat. 251.)

Proposed by Congress March 2, 1861.

Ratified by the following States:

Ohio, March 13, 1861.

Maryland, January 10, 1862.

Illinois (convention), February 14, 1862.

ATTEMPTS TO REGULATE RATIFICATION.

On May 23, 1866, when the resolution proposing the fourteenth amendment was under consideration, Mr. Buckalew, of Pennsylvania, submitted an amendment to add to the resolution the following additional section:

"SEC. 6. This amendment shall be passed upon in each State by the legislature thereof which shall be chosen, or the members of the most popular branch of which shall be chosen, next after the submission of the amendment, and at its first session; and no acceptance or rejection shall be reconsidered or again brought in question at any subsequent session; nor shall any acceptance of the amendment be valid if made after three years from the passage of this resolution." (Cong. Globe, vol. 36, p. 2771.)

When the fifteenth amendment was before the Senate on February 3, 1869, Mr. Buckalew, of Pennsylvania, proposed to add to the resolution submitting it to the States the words:

"That the foregoing amendment shall be submitted to the legislatures of the several States, the most numerous branch of which shall be chosen next after the passage of this resolution." (Cong. Globe, vol. 40, p. 828.)

His speech in support of this proposal on February 5, 1869, is reported in the Congressional Globe, volume 40, pages 912 and 913. On February 9, 1869, this amendment was rejected—yeas 13, nays 43.

On February 17, 1869, an amendment practically identical with the above was offered by Mr. Hendricks, of Indiana, and the constitutionality of such a limitation was discussed by Senators Morton, Bayard, Buckalew, Dixon, and Yates. The question being taken, the amendment was rejected—yeas 12, nays 40. (Cong. Globe, vol. 40, pp. 1311-1314.)

On January 30, 1882, Mr. Berry, of California, introduced a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 116, 47th Cong., 1st sess.) proposing an amendment to the Constitution to regulate ratification, as follows:

"SECTION 1. The legislature of a State shall not vote upon a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States except at a regular session held following an election of the members of the most numerous branch of the State legislature, which election must take place subsequent to the time of submission by Congress or a convention of the proposed amendment.

"SEC. 2. This amendment shall not take effect until the 5th of March, 1885."

On March 17, 1869, Mr. Morton, of Indiana, introduced in the Senate, and on March 29, 1869, Mr. Shanks, of Indiana, introduced in the House identical joint resolutions (S. J. Res. 32 and H. J. Res. 57, 41st Cong., 1st sess.), which read as follows:

"Be it resolved, etc., That on the sixth legislative day of a regular session, or of a legally called special session, of any State legislature, each house of said legislature, at the hour of 12 meridian, shall proceed to the consideration of any amendment of the Constitution of the United States that may have been submitted by the Congress of the United States to the legislatures of the several States for ratification, according to the provisions of the fifth article of the Constitution of the United States: Provided, That such amendment may not have been acted upon at any preceding session of said legislature. And if, upon the consideration of such amendment, it shall receive the votes of a majority of the members elected to each house of said legislature, it shall be held to be duly ratified by such legislature. And if final action is not taken upon the first day, then the house shall meet the next day at the same hour and so continue to meet from day to day (Sundays excepted) until final action is taken upon such amendment. Nor shall the action of either house of said legislature upon such amendment be hindered or prevented by the resignation or withdrawal, or the refusal to qualify, of a minority of either or of both houses of said legislature.

"SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That if such amendment or amendments shall be ratified according to the provisions of the preceding section, the same shall be duly certified by the officers of each house and shall be transmitted by the governor of the State to the President of the United States."

OPERATIONS OF THE BUDGET—ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT HARDING.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, yesterday the President of the United States, through the Vice President, Mr. Coolidge, delivered a very excellent address to the "members of the Government's business organization" at its fourth regular meeting having to do with operations of the Budget Bureau. I ask unanimous consent that the address may be printed in the RECORD in regular RECORD type.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type, as follows:

PRESIDENT'S SPEECH COMMENDING BUDGET.

Following is the text of President Harding's address read by Vice President Coolidge yesterday on the operations of the Bureau of the Budget:

Members of the Government's business organization, this is the fourth regular meeting of the business organization of the Government. We have met to review the work of the first six months and to consider the task which confronts us for the remaining period of this fiscal year 1923 along the lines of co-ordination, economy, and efficiency—three inseparable factors to successful government. There can be no economy of operation without coordination, and efficiency without economy is impossible.

The first meeting of the business organization of the Government was held June 29, 1921, less than one month after the enactment of the budget and accounting act. We faced then the problem of inaugurating a budget system, and growing out of this the further problem of reforming the uncoordinated routine business of the Government. Probably there never was a time in our country's history when a revision of its financial procedures was so urgent and necessary. The habit of large expenditures, of almost unlimited obligation of the public credit, acquired during the World War, seemed difficult to restrain, while the continuing demand upon the National Treasury gave little indication of abatement.

POINTS WITH PRIDE TO RESULTS.

The budget and accounting act placed definitely upon the Chief Executive responsibility for checking the flood of expenditure. This task called for the help of the Government officers and employees, as the solution of the problem lay in coordination of the Government's business, requiring cooperation of its personnel and their commitment to a continuing constructive policy of economy. From this determination—that the solution of the financial problems of the Government could be achieved only by teamwork—came the call for that first meeting of those officials and employees in the Government service who have to do with its routine business. The campaign, then begun with such high hopes and courageous defiance of the obstacles to be overcome, is continuing to-day, and with no little pride and satisfaction we point to a continuing policy of economy with efficiency evidenced by the progressive and material reductions made in expenditures. This has been accomplished not only without impairment of the effective operation of the Government's departments and establishments but with an increase of efficiency resulting from a closer study of methods and cost of operation.

This achievement—your achievement—is a matter of great satisfaction to the Chief Executive, who takes this opportunity to express appreciation to all who have participated in the constructive and patriotic work, not only those charged with the administration of Government funds and who control large and important activities but, as well, those devoted Government people who have applied principles of economy to their daily work in various smaller ways through the conservation of Government supplies and time. When the spirit of real economy has permeated the entire rank and file of the public service, and the use of time and supplies is regarded as a public trust, many of our problems will be solved.

THREATENED DEFICIT RECALLED.

At our last meeting on July 11, 1922, we had just entered upon a new fiscal year. We were concerned over a threatened discrepancy of large proportions between estimated receipts and estimated expenditures. The executive departments estimated that they would call upon the Treasury during the 12 months of the year July 1, 1922, to June 30, 1923, for $3,771,000,000, while the estimate of ordinary receipts for that period reached a total of only $3,073,000,000. This situation indicated withdrawals from the Treasury of $698,000,000 more than it was anticipated would be received from ordinary sources. At that time, however, I expressed confidence that with the Budget organization and your cooperation we need not be unduly concerned and urged additional concerted effort to curtail expenditures in the laudable endeavor to keep our expenditures within our income.

The statement of expected receipts and proposed and anticipated expenditures given in the Budget for 1924, transmitted to Congress December 5 last, showed a probable excess of expenditures over receipts for the fiscal year 1923 of $273,000,000, a downward revision of $425,000,000 in the estimate made in July, and a real downward revision of $550,000,000 as the Budget statement included as an ordinary expenditure an item of $125,000,000 for discount accruals on war savings securities due January 1, 1923, which was not embraced in the estimate made in July. I am now advised that a revised estimate, just completed, shows a further reduction in the anticipated deficit for 1923 of $181,000,000, which indicates, as the situation exists to-day, an apparent deficit of $92,000,000 for the current fiscal year. This gratifying result is due not only to reductions in the program of expenditure but also to an increase in the anticipated total of revenue and other receipts for the year. The adherence to the policy of economy and the effective coordination of routine business were important factors in reducing this estimated deficit.

What now confronts us is the overcoming of this estimated deficit of $92,000,000, and, if possible, the closing of this fiscal year with a balance on the right side of the ledger. I must look to you, therefore, for continuing efforts to control your expenditures during the remainder of this fiscal year, for in this way you can aid materially. I know that I can rely upon you.

At my last meeting with you I emphasized the necessity of keeping the estimates for the next fiscal year, ending June 30, 1924, within the receipts for that year which, at that time, were estimated at $3,198,000,000. I also stated that the probable receipts for the next fiscal year would not permit as liberal appropriations as were provided for the current year. It is a pleasure to state that the estimates of appropriations submitted to Congress for the fiscal year 1924 are $120,000,000 less than the estimated receipts for that year, and $196,000,000 less than the appropriations for the current year. Whatever pressure may have been brought to bear on the executive departments of the Government with reference to their estimates, there must have been in the departments concerned a spirit of sacrifice and cooperation to make this real achievement possible. Treasury conditions, however, demanded such cooperation and sacrifice. The Chief Executive expected it, but nevertheless wishes to express his full appreciation of it.

RESPONSIBLE FOR BUDGET.

In view of the importance of the subject and to guard against misapprehension as to the nature of the Budget, I take occasion to refer to the fundamental principles which control its preparation. Under the terms of the law the President is required to transmit the Budget. It is his Budget; he recommends it to Congress upon his own responsibility as the head of the executive branch of the Government. The estimates of appropriations contained therein are his estimates, except those for the legislative branch and the Supreme Court. The Budget law, recognizing the fact that the President could not personally attend to all of the details involved in the preparation of the Budget, gave to him an agency and designated it the Bureau of the Budget. It did not confer upon this bureau any function which it could exercise independently of rules and regulations of the President. There can not, therefore, be any conflict of procedure or policy between the President or the members of his Cabinet and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget. The Budget as transmitted to Congress embodies the administrative policies which the President has decided to recommend.

Very significant and encouraging is the cooperation and collaboration between Congress and the Executive in connection with estimates for appropriations. It is the endeavor of the President to present to Congress calls for funds that are sufficient, and no more than sufficient, to carry out approved policies. The budget and accounting act place no limitation upon the power and right of Congress to increase or decrease estimates submitted. This is in accord with the spirit of our institutions, and is as it should be. It is my hope and expectation that, as the Budget procedures develop, the estimates transmitted to Congress will be so carefully prepared, and will present so accurate a picture of the real operating needs of the Government as materially to lighten the burden of the appropriating committees. But it is not expected or desired that Congress should relinquish any of its prerogatives regarding public funds—prerogatives so wisely given to the people's representatives by the founders of the Government.

COORDINATION BRINGS RESULTS.

I am kept advised by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget of the constructive work being done by the various coordinating agencies and area coordinators under the immediate leadership of the chief coordinator, and of the value of the work being done by the several coordinating boards composed of the representatives of the departments and establishments. These coordinating agencies are accomplishing the purpose for which they were created—to provide the machinery through which to coordinate the activities of the departments and establishments, so as to guarantee the most provident and efficient expenditures of public funds, and to furnish the Executive an agency for imposing a unified, concerted plan of governmental routine business. The results attained show how admirable these important agencies are functioning. They are performing a most important part in the task of developing teamwork, instituting economies, and applying business principles to Government routine operation. These efforts have the interest and cordial indorsement of the Chief Executive.

I am also much interested in the organization of the Federal associations in various parts of the country carrying out from the seat of government into the field the gospel of teamwork, economy, and efficiency.

A subject always in mind when I meet with you is that of deficiency and supplemental estimates, and I am glad to note a marked improvement in the number, character, and amount of such estimates this fiscal year. The fact that Congress has made a new record in the passing of appropriation bills at an early date makes it certain that the heads of departments and establishments will have sufficient time before the beginning of the fiscal year 1924 to plan their expenditure program and apportion the funds appropriated to fit the program so planned. This makes it possible to avoid to a greater extent than in other years the necessity for supplemental and deficiency appropriations.

KEEPING OF RESERVES URGED.

I am not unmindful of the fact that many appropriations are made for disbursement by the departments, although the total of the obligations to be discharged is not within administrative control, payments being required to be made pursuant to the terms of specific statutes. Supplemental estimates in such cases can not be avoided, no matter how carefully estimates have been considered, both in the preparation and in the action by Congress thereon, unless the original estimate be made largely in excess of what past experience has indicated will be required. However, where appropriations are within the control of administrative officers a serious emergency only should justify departure from a well-considered plan of expenditure made in advance and contemplating a total within the amount fixed in the appropriating act. I shall expect, therefore, that in making expenditure plans for 1924 you will give this subject most careful consideration and in making apportionment of appropriations under your control you will not fail to make provision, usually by setting up a reasonable reserve, for the ordinary variation in the needs of the several periods of the year and what may be called ordinary emergencies.

General Lord, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, will take up with you in detail the work of the past six months, with particular reference to the preparation of the Budget and the work of the various coordinating agencies, and I give way to him, expressing in closing, however, my satisfaction and appreciation of the good work you have done, the good work you are doing, and the good work I know you will continue to do.

WORK FOR WHOLE NATION.

If you have made sacrifices of certain cherished plans in connection with your work in order that expenditures might be reduced, if you have become discouraged and wearied at this continuing insistence upon economy, if you have labored, as possibly some of you have labored, without apparent recognition of your services, we should remember that what we are doing is not for ourselves, not for our immediate chief, not for the President of the United States, but for the people, the stockholders of this great business, who are dependent upon us for the welfare and the proper conduct of this great business. Honest work well and faithfully done brings its own recompense in the consciousness of duty performed. To you, representatives of the business organization of the Government, and to all my faithful collaborators in the Government service, wherever stationed, I tender my thanks and appreciation for services rendered.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL NOON TO-MORROW.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RURAL-CREDIT FACILITIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States; to amend the Federal farm loan act; to amend the Federal reserve act; and for other purposes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senate has now been in session 4 hours and 20 minutes to-day, and, while it is constantly asserted by certain Senators across the aisle that they are vitally interested in the welfare of the farmer and are anxious to see rural credits legislation passed at this session, we have not even touched the consideration of the pending bill to-day.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] occupied something like three hours of the time of the Senate this afternoon in what I think was clear to everyone was an undisguised filibuster. That would not have been so serious if it were not for the fact that the Senators who are discussing extraneous subjects and occupying the time of the Senate, when they ought to be considering the question before the Senate, are preventing thousands of farmers in this country from obtaining the credit facilities for the planting of their crops this spring which they might obtain if Senators would address themselves to the pending legislation. At best this bill can not become a law and be put into operation by whatever agency shall be created within 30 or 60 days. Do not those Senators see that if the discussion drifts on as it has been drifting, every day that is wasted in the Senate instead of being devoted to the consideration of the pending legislation may mean the loss of the proposed credit facilities to the farmers of the United States for the planting of their crops this year?

Mr. President, I know the Senator from Mississippi would be delighted if I should fall into his trap, as some other Senators sometimes do, and aid him in his efforts to delay matters by replying to him, but I am not going to do that. The Senator from Mississippi, however, like other Senators, when he engages in making a speech solely for the purpose of delay necessarily can not be very accurate in his statements. That was true in the case of the Senator from Mississippi to-day. He occupied half an hour of the time of the Senate in an effort to argue that President Harding took no interest in the needs of agriculture or in a financial credit system for the farmer until after the election last November.

Mr. President, in order that whoever may hereafter read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD may ascertain for himself how utterly reckless the Senator from Mississippi has been in his statements to-day I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Record the speech of President Harding at the agricultural conference called by him more than a year ago, at which time he discussed this whole question fully, utterly refuting the statement of the Senator from Mississippi.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address of the President is as follows:

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Secretary Wallace and members of the conference, it is an occasion of the greatest satisfaction to me that Secretary Wallace's invitation has been so widely and cordially accepted. I confess the firm belief that in the public life of a people so intelligent as the American Nation most problems may be regarded as well on the way to solution when they are once reduced to their simplest terms and generally understood. This conference was called with the aim to bring about such a general understanding of the critical situation now confronting American agriculture.

We all understand that this conference is not a legislative body. Its recommendations will require to be written into the statute books by other authorities, or applied in administration, after sanction by those who must assume responsibility. But we do confidently anticipate that the considerations here had will be helpful and illuminating to those immediately responsible for the formulation of public policy in dealing with these problems. Therefore it has seemed to me I can make no more appropriate observation than that your work here will be of value precisely as you address yourselves to the realities, the matters of fact, the understanding of conditions as they are, and the proposal of feasible and practicable methods for dealing with those conditions.

Concerning the grim reality of the present crisis in agriculture, there can be no differences of opinion among informed people. The depressions and discouragements are not peculiar to agriculture, and I think it fair to say there could have been no avoidance of a great slump from war-time excesses to the hardships of readjustment. We can have no helpful understanding by assuming that agriculture suffers alone, but we may fairly recognize the fundamental difficulties which accentuate the agricultural discouragements and menace the healthful life of this basic and absolutely necessary industry.

I do not need to tell you or the country of the supreme service that the farmer rendered our Nation and the world during the war. Peculiar circumstances placed our allies in Europe, as well as our own country, in a position of peculiar and unprecedented dependence on the American farmer. With his labor supply limited and in conditions which made producing costs high beyond all precedent, the farmer rose to the emergency. He did everything that was asked of him, and more than most people believed it was possible for him to do. Now, in his hour of disaster, consequent on the reaction from the feverish conditions of war, he comes to us asking that he be given support and assistance which shall testify our appreciation of his service. To this he is entitled, not only for the service he has done but because if we fail him we will precipitate a disaster that will affect every industrial and commercial activity of the Nation.

The administration has been keenly alive to the situation, and has given encouragement and support to every measure which it believed calculated to ameliorate the condition of agriculture. In the effort to finance crop movements, to expand foreign markets, to expand credits at home and abroad, much has been accomplished. These have been, it is true, largely in the nature of emergency measures. So long as the emergency continues, it must be dealt with as such; but at the same time there is every reason for us to consider those permanent modifications of policy which may make relief permanent, may secure agriculture so far as possible against the danger that such conditions will arise again, and place it as an industry in the firmest and most assured position for the future.

You men are thoroughly familiar with the distressing details of present conditions in the agricultural community. The whole country has an acute concern with the conditions and the problems which you are met to consider. It is a truly national interest, and not entitled to be regarded as primarily the concern of either a class or a section.

Agriculture is the oldest and most elemental of industries. Every other activity is intimately related to and largely dependent upon it. It is the first industry to which society makes appeal in every period of distress and difficulty. When war is precipitated, the first demand is made on the farmer, that he will produce the wherewithal for both combatants and the civil population to be fed, and in large part also to be clothed and equipped. It is a curious fact that agriculture has always been the first line of support of communities in war and too commonly the victim of those distresses which emanate from great conflicts. Perhaps I may be pardoned a word by way of developing this idea. Until comparatively very recent times the land was the first prize of victory in war. The conqueror distributed the subjugated soil among his favorites and gave them his prisoners as slaves to work it. Thus the ownership of the land became the symbol of favor and aristocracy, while the working of it was regarded as the task of menials, dedicated to ill-paid toil in order that the owners of the land and the rulers of the state might be able to maintain themselves in luxury and to enforce their political authority.

Coming down through the ages, we see the advance of civilization gradually emancipating the soil from this low estate. We see the institutions of serfdom and villenage, under the feudal order, succeeding those of slavery. Later we see the creation of a rural peasantry, comprising broadly those who till the soil but in most cases do not own it, and whose political rights are very restricted. It is, indeed, not until we come to very recent times and to our own country's development that we see the soil lifted above the taint of this unjust heredity and restored to the full dignity and independence to which it is entitled.

Even in our own times and under the most modern and enlightened establishments the soil has continued to enjoy less liberal institutions for its encouragement and promotion than many other forms of industry. Commerce and manufacturing have been afforded ample financial facilities for their encouragement and expansion, while agriculture on the whole has lagged behind. The merchant, the manufacturer, the great instruments of public transportation, have been provided methods by which they enlist necessary capital more readily than does the farmer. A great manufacturing industry can consolidate under the ownership of a single corporation with a multitude of stockholders, a great number of originally separate establishments, and thus effect economies and concentrations, and acquire for itself a power in the markets where it must buy and in the markets where it must sell, such as have not been made available to agriculture. The farmer is the most individualistic and independent citizen among us. He comes nearest to being self-sufficient; but precisely because of this he has not claimed for himself the right to employ those means of cooperation, coordination, and consolidation which serve so usefully in other industries. A score or more of manufacturers consolidate their interests under a corporate organization and attain a great increase of their power in the markets, whether they are buying or selling. The farmer, from the very mode of his life, has been estopped from these effective combinations; therefore, because he buys and sells as an individual, it is his fate to buy in the dearest and sell in the cheapest market.

The great industrial corporation sells its bonds in order to get what we may call its fixed or plant capital, just as the farmer sells a mortgage on his land in order to get at least a large part of his fixed or plant capital. I am not commending the bonding or mortgage system of capitalization, rather only recognizing a fact. But there in large part the analogy ends. Both the manufacturer and the farmer still require provision of working capital. The manufacturer, whose turnover is rapid, finds that in the seasons when he needs unusual amounts of working capital he can go to the bank and borrow on short-time notes. His turnover is rapid, and the money will come back in time to meet his short-term obligation. The merchant finances his operations in the same way. But the farmer is in a different case. His turnover period is a long one; his annual production is small compared to the amount of investment. For almost any crop the turnover period is at least a year; for live stock it may require two or three years for a single turnover. Yet the farmer is compelled, if he borrows his working capital, to borrow for short periods, to renew his paper several times before his turnover is possible, and to take the chance that if he is called upon untimely to pay off his notes he may be compelled to sacrifice growing crops or unfinished live stock. Obviously the farmer needs to have provisions adapted to his requirements for extension of credit to produce his working capital.

Under the necessities of war time consolidation and centralization of credit resources and financial capabilities went far to sustain the struggle. Essential industries were extended the help and support of society because society recognized its dependence on them. Much that was economically unsound and unfair was perpetrated under cover of this effort to uphold necessary industrial factors. But the lesson was useful and justifies inquiry as to whether, properly adapted to peace conditions, the methods of larger integration and wider cooperation might not well be projected into times of peace.

The need of better financial facilities for the farmer must be apparent on the most casual consideration of the profound divergence between methods of financing agriculture and other industries. The farmer who owns his farm is capitalist, executive, and laborer all in one. As capitalist he earns the smaller return on his investment. As executive he is little paid, and as laborer he is greatly underpaid in comparison to labor in other occupations.

There is much misconception regarding the financial status of agriculture. If the mortgage indebtedness of farms shows over a given period a marked tendency to increase, the fact becomes occasion for concern. If during the same period the railroads or the great industries controlled by corporations find themselves able to increase their mortgage indebtedness by dint of bond issues, the fact is heralded as evidence of better business conditions and of capital's increased willingness to engage in these industries and thus insure larger production and better employment of labor. Both the mechanism of finance and the preconceptions of the community are united in creating the impression that easy access to ample capital is a disadvantage to the farmer, and an evidence of his decay in prosperity, while precisely the same circumstances are construed in other industries as evidence of prosperity and of desirable business expansion.

In the matter of what may be called fixed investment capital, the disadvantage of the farmer so strongly impressed public opinion that a few years ago the Federal Farm Loan Board was established to afford better supplies of capital for plant investment and to insure moderate interest rates. But while unquestionably farm finance has benefited, the board has thus far not extended its operations to the provision of working capital for the farmer as distinguished from permanent investment in the plant. There should be developed a thorough code of law and business procedure, with the proper machinery of finance, through some agency, to insure that turnover capital shall be as generously supplied to the farmer and on as reasonable terms as to other industries. An industry more vital than any other, in which nearly half the Nation's wealth is invested can be relied upon for good security and certain returns.

In the aggregate, the capital indebtedness of the country's agricultural plant is small, not large. Compared with other industries, the wonder is that agriculture, thus deprived of easy access to both investment and accommodation capital, has prospered even so well.

The lines on which financial support of agriculture may be organized are suggested in the plan of the Federal Farm Loan Board, and in those rural finance societies which have been so effective in some European countries. The cooperative loaning associations of Europe have been effective incentives to united action by farmers, and have led them directly into cooperation in both production and marketing which have contributed greatly to the stabilization and prosperity of agriculture. Whether we examine the cooperative societies of Russia, now recognized as the most potent support in that disturbed country for orderly society, or whether we turn to the great and illuminated cooperative associations which have strengthened the California agricultural industries; whether we examine the cooperative societies of Ireland and Denmark or the like organizations which handle the potatoes of Maine, or the cantaloupes of Colorado; whether we consider these organizations as means to buying the farmer's requirements in a cheaper market or to selling his products in a more remunerative one, the conclusion is in all cases the same. It is, that the farmer is as good a business man as any other when he has the chance; that he is capable of organization, cooperation, and coordination; that he will apply sound methods to his business whenever he has the chance; that his credit can be better established, his particular needs of capital on terms suited to his requirements can be met; that, these things accomplished, he ceases to be an underpaid laborer, an unpaid executive, and a capitalist with an unremunerative investment.

It can not be too strongly urged that the farmer must be ready to help himself. This conference would do most lasting good if it would find ways to impress the great mass of farmers to avail themselves of the best methods. By this I mean that, in the last analysis, legislation can do little more than give the farmer the chance to organize and help himself.

Take cooperative marketing. American farmers are asking for, and it should be possible to afford them, ample provision of law under which they may carry on in cooperative fashion those business operations which lend themselves to that method, and which, thus handled, would bring advantage to both the farmer and his consuming public. In countries where these facilities and opportunities have been afforded such cooperative organizations have been carried to the highest usefulness and are recognized as aiding both farmer and consumer. They make the farmer's selling price higher and the consumer's buying price lower.

But when we shall have done this, the farmers must become responsible for doing the rest. They must learn organization and the practical procedures of cooperation. These things we can not do for them, but we can and should give them the chance to do them for themselves. It will be for them to demonstrate their readiness and willingness and ability to utilize such instrumentalities. There is need for wide dissemination of information and understanding of methods, and for development of what I may call the spirit and purpose of cooperation. The various excellent societies of farmers which are represented here have a large responsibility in this regard. They have already done much, but they have much more to do if the American farmer shall be brought most effectively to help himself through organization and cooperation.

One of the most serious obstacles to a proper balancing of agricultural production lies in the lack of essential information. All too frequently such information is gathered by private interests whose concern is private profit rather than the general good. Agriculture can not thrive under conditions which permit the speculator, the broker, the forester, because of superior information, to become chief beneficiaries. The element of speculation in crop production is at best so great as to dictate that other speculative elements, always liable to be manipulated to the disadvantage of the producer, shall be reduced to the minimum.

With proper financial support for agriculture, and with instrumentalities for the collection and dissemination of useful information, a group of cooperative-marketing organizations would be able to advise their members as to the probable demand for staples, and to propose measures for proper limitation of acreages in particular crops. The certainty that such scientific distribution of production was to be observed would strengthen the credit of agriculture and increase the security on which financial advances could be made to it.

The disastrous effects which arise from overproduction are notorious. The congressional joint committee on agricultural conditions in the valuable report which it has recently issued declares that a deficiency of one-tenth in the production of a particular staple means an increase of three-tenths in the price, while a deficit of two-tenths in production will mean an increase of eight-tenths in the price.

The converse of this is just as emphatically true. In a recent address to the Congress I stated this situation thus:

"It is rather shocking to be told, and to have the statement strongly supported, that 9,000,000 bales of cotton raised on American plantations in a given year will actually be worth more to the producers than 13,000,000 would have been. Equally shocking is the statement that 700,000,000 bushels of wheat raised by American farmers would bring them more money than a billion bushels. Yet these are not exaggerated statements. In a world where there are tens of millions who need food and clothing which they can not get such a condition is sure to indict the social system which makes it possible."

It is apparent that the interest of the consumer, quite equally with that of the producer, demands measures to prevent these violent fluctuations which result from unorganized and haphazard production. Indeed, the statistics of this entire subject clearly demonstrate that the consumer's concern for better stabilized conditions is quite equal to that of the producer. The farmer does not demand special consideration to the disadvantage of any other class; he asks only for that consideration which shall place his vital industry on a parity of opportunity with others and enable it to serve the broadest interest.

No country is so dependent upon railroad transportation as is the United States. The irregular coast lines of Europe, its numerous indenting arms of the sea, as well as its great river system, afford that continent exceptional water transportation. The vast continental area of the United States is quite differently situated, its greater dependence upon railroad transportation being attested by its possession of nearly one-half the railroad mileage of the world; and even this is not adequate. The inevitable expansion of population will enormously increase the burden upon our transportation facilities, and proper forethought must dictate the present adoption of wise and far-seeing policies in dealing with transportation.

If broad-visioned statesmanship shall establish fundamentally sound policies toward transportation, the present crisis will one day be regarded as a piece of good fortune to the Nation. To this time railroad construction, financing, and operation have been unscientific and devoid of proper consideration for the wider concerns of the community. To say this is simply to admit a fact which applies to practically every railroad system in the world. It is as true regarding the railroads of Canada and Great Britain as it is in reference to those of the United States. It is equally applicable to the railways of continental Europe, in whose development considerations of political and military availability have too far overweighed economic usefulness. In America we have too long neglected our waterways. We need a practical development of water resources for both transportation and power. A large share of railway tonnage is coal for railroad fuel. The experience of railway electrification demonstrates the possibility of reducing this waste and increasing efficiency. We may well begin very soon to consider plans to electrify our railroads. If such a suggestion seems to involve inordinate demands upon our financial and industrial power, it may be replied that three generations ago the suggestion of building 260,000 miles of railways in this country would have been scouted as a financial and industrial impossibility. Waterway improvement represents not only the possibility of expanding our transportation system, but also of producing hydroelectric power for its operation and for the activities of widely diffused industry.

I have spoken of the advantage which Europe enjoys because of its easy access to the sea, the cheapest and surest transportation facility. In our own country is presented one of the world's most attractive opportunities for extension of the seaways many hundred miles inland. The heart of the continent, with its vast resources in both agriculture and industry, would be brought in communication with all the ocean routes by the execution of the St. Lawrence waterway project. To enable ocean-going vessels to have access to all the ports of the Great Lakes would have a most stimulating effect upon the industrial life of the continent's interior. The feasibility of the project is unquestioned, and its cost, compared with some other great engineering works, would be small. Disorganized and prostrate, the nations of central Europe are even now setting their hands to the development of a great continental waterway, which, connecting the Rhine and Danube, will bring water transportation from the Black to the North Sea, from Mediterranean to Baltic. If nationalist prejudices and economic difficulties can be overcome by Europe, they certainly should not be formidable obstacles to an achievement less expensive and giving promise of yet greater advantages to the peoples of North America. Not only would the cost of transportation be greatly reduced but a vast population would be brought overnight in immediate touch with the markets of the entire world.

This conference needs have no fear of unfortunate effects from the fullest development of national resources. A narrow view might dictate, in the present agricultural stress, antagonism to projects of reclamation, rehabilitation, and extension of the agricultural area. To the contrary, if agriculture is to hold its high place, there must be the most liberal policy in extending its opportunity. The war, as was recently well said by the Secretary of Agriculture, has brought our country more quickly, but not more inevitably, to the necessity of deciding whether this shall be predominantly an industrial country or one in which industry and agriculture shall be encouraged to prosper side by side, and to complement each other in building here a community of diverse interests. If our policy shall be, as it ought, to encourage the dual development, then we have need to consider the early and continuing reclamation of those great areas which with proper treatment would become valuable additions to our agricultural capacity. To this end every practical proposal for watering our arid and semiarid land, for reclaiming cut-over forest areas, for protecting fertile valleys from inundations, and for draining the potentially rich and widely extended swamp areas, should be given the full encouragement of the Government. All this should be a part of recognized permanent policy. Not otherwise will it be possible to keep the Nation self-supporting and as nearly self-contained as it has been in the past.

There must be a new conception of the farmer's place in our social and economic scheme. The time is long past when we may think of farming as an occupation fitting for the man who is not equipped for or has somehow failed at some other line of endeavor. The successful farmer of to-day, far from being an untrained laborer working every day and every hour that sun and weather permit, is required to be the most expert and particularly the most versatile of artisans, executives, and business men. He must be a good deal of an engineer, to deal with problems of drainage, road building, and the like. He requires the practical knowledge of an all-round mechanic to handle his machinery and get best results from it. The problems of stock raising and breeding demand understanding of biology, while those of plant raising and breeding call for a wide practical knowledge of botany and plant pathology.

In handling his soils for best results, in using fertilizers, determining rotations, and in selecting and using feeds for stock he has need for a working knowledge of chemistry. As our timber supply is reduced, his service in conserving and expanding the timber resources of the farm will be increasingly important, necessitating an intimacy with forestry and forestation. There is no business in which the executive talents of the skilled organizer and manager are more absolutely necessary than in successful farming, and this applies alike to the producing, the buying, and the selling phases of farming. Along with all this the farmer must have untiring energy and a real love and enthusiasm for his splendid profession. For such I choose to call the vocation of the farmer—the most useful, and, it ought to be made, one of the most attractive among all lines of human effort.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LENROOT. I do.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to suggest, in connection with what the Senator from Wisconsin stated, that a month or so ago many Senators on this floor were urging the importance of legislation for the farmer; they were urging the necessity of the Senate proceeding at once to the consideration of rural credit measures, and yet now, when rural credit legislation is before the Senate, apparently they have lost their zeal for the farmer and have taken the time of the Senate upon entirely extraneous matters, thereby preventing the passage of legislation that would be of benefit to the farmer.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to say there is not any question but that the rural credits bill will pass the Senate; there is no effort being made to prevent its passage. It is pretty well understood there will be no difficulty about the enactment of the legislation by this Congress so far as the Senate is concerned.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask for a vote on my amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I wish to say merely a word with reference to the amendment. I doubt very much whether the provision of the Federal reserve act which the Senator from Alabama seeks to repeal by the amendment ever did any good, and I am perfectly sure there is no occasion for retaining it in the law now. My own view is that any bank that would be willing to pay as high a rate of interest as the Senator from Alabama has so often narrated to the Senate ought not to be given credit at all, and it would not be if this provision of the law were repealed. The provision is not any longer in force, so far as the Federal Reserve Board is concerned, and is not utilized, and I think that it ought to be repealed.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, it is true that the provision is not now utilized and the rediscount rate has been reduced, but the provision is still in the law and ought to be taken out, because if it remains in the law at some time in the future it may again be resorted to. I ask for a vote upon the amendment.

Mr. KING. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 13. That the act approved April 13, 1920, being Public, No. 170, Sixty-sixth Congress, entitled "An act to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. I desire to offer some perfecting amendments. On page 2, line 16, after the word "corporation," I move to strike out the comma and insert a semicolon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire of the Senator why that change should be made? The sentence seems to be grammatical with the present punctuation.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not want the words "organized under the laws of any State" to relate back to national banks; that is all. National banks, of course, are not organized under the laws of any State.

Mr. FLETCHER. But the Senator proposes to include in the act incorporated live-stock loan or farm-credit companies?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes. I am going to offer another amendment to insert the words "or of the United States," so as to include the corporations provided for under the Capper bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin to strike out the comma and insert a semicolon at the place indicated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. On page 2, line 19, after the word "State," I move to insert the words "or of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. On page 5, line 22, after the words "live stock," I move to insert the word "loan."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether the antecedent is clearly shown there; that is, whether the context would indicate that it was intended to include live-stock loan companies?

Mr. LENROOT. It will read "live-stock loan company."

Mr. KING. Is the Senator proposing to amend existing law?

Mr. LENROOT. No; this is new legislation.

Mr. KING. I apprehend that there is a distinction between a live-stock company and a live-stock loan company.

Mr. LENROOT. That is why I want to put in the word "loan." The word "loan" has been omitted merely through an error. The provision is only intended to refer to live-stock loan companies.

Mr. KING. That is what I was inquiring about, whether there was anything in this bill or in the bill of which this is amendatory to indicate that a live-stock loan company was in contemplation of the legislators rather than a live-stock company.

Mr. LENROOT. That was one of the primary purposes of the Capper bill.

I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in page 13.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 13, on lines 4, 5, and 6, it is proposed to strike out the words "and may be paid out of any surplus in excess of 100 per cent of subscribed capital."

Mr. KING. I ask that that amendment be again stated.

The amendment was again stated.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will not the Senator from Wisconsin explain that amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. This amendment and the one following that will be offered to this section are to make it identical with the amendments that were adopted to the same provision in the Capper bill. Senators will remember that there was a good deal of discussion and controversy over that section of the bill, and the matter was settled by the Senate. This amendment is merely to carry out the will of the Senate, as expressed in the Capper bill, with respect to this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. On page 13, line 7, it is proposed to strike out the words "and surplus," so that, if amended, it will read:

Out of any net earnings remaining after the aforesaid dividends claims have been fully met there shall be paid each year—

And so forth.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let me inquire the significance of that and see that we fully apprehend it, because it seems to me that that is an amendment of some importance.

Mr. LENROOT. I will say that as this language was originally written—the Senator will remember that it was fully discussed in connection with the Capper bill—no dividend could be paid until a surplus of 100 per cent had been accumulated. That was changed so that the dividend may be paid out of pending earnings, but after the dividend is paid a surplus shall be accumulated until it shall amount to 100 per cent of the subscribed capital; and then, when 12 per cent is earned, an additional 3 per cent may be distributed, and of the remaining earnings 10 per cent may be paid to the surplus and 90 per cent as an additional franchise tax.

Mr. McLEAN. It conforms to the present law.

Mr. LENROOT. It conforms to the present law exactly.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether the amendment which he has just offered meets the concurrence of the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. LENROOT. The chairman of the committee is here. He himself offered the same amendment to the Capper bill.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes. These amendments were offered and adopted to the Capper bill, because as the bill now reads no dividend could be paid until the Federal reserve bank had accumulated a surplus of 100 per cent, and that was not intended by the committee; it was not intended by the author of the bill; and we had to make this correction so that the Federal reserve banks could draw their dividends on their stocks as under the original act. There was no intention to interfere with that; but the Capper bill, as originally drawn, contained that error, and we want this provision to be identical with the provision in the Capper bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator to what extent he is seeking to modify the provisions of the original Federal reserve law, which is the existing law dealing with this particular question?

Mr. McLEAN. None whatever, except that when the banks earn more than 12 per cent, and have their 100 per cent put aside, then 3 per cent can be added to the dividends on the stock, as an invitation to the State banks to come into the system.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, as I understand, this language with the words stricken out as proposed by the Senator is precisely the same as in the Federal reserve act.

Mr. McLEAN. Precisely.

Mr. FLETCHER. So there is no change in that provision.

Mr. KING. Then, as I understand the Senator, it was not contemplated by the committee or by the proponent of this bill that the words "and surplus" should be there?

Mr. McLEAN. No. If the Senator will read the provision as printed in the bill, he will see that no dividend can be paid until the bank has accumulated 100 per cent surplus.

Mr. KING. Yes; I understand.

Mr. McLEAN. It was an error in drafting the bill, and it was noticed, and I had it corrected in the Capper bill, and it should be corrected in this bill.

Mr. KING. But it passed unnoticed in the committee, and the committee in reporting the bill did not ask for emendation as suggested now by the Senator?

Mr. McLEAN. It was amended in the Senate when the Capper bill came into the Senate.

Mr. KING. I am speaking of the present bill—the Lenroot bill—now under discussion.

Mr. McLEAN. This bill was reported before the Capper bill was passed, I think.

Mr. LENROOT. It was agreed in the committee that the same changes should be made in both bills.

Mr. KING. Then it was just an error in reporting the bill without noticing this proposed amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. It was; and I think it arose from the fact that the original draftsman of that section assumed that 100 per cent surplus had been accumulated in all of the banks, and that has proved not to be so.

Mr. McLEAN. That was the assumption; but it was ascertained that the Dallas bank had not accumulated the surplus.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, on line 17, does not the Senator think the language would be a little clearer if we added, after the word "earnings," the words "of any year," so that it would read:

And thereafter when net earnings of any year exceed 12 per cent.

Mr. LENROOT. That is all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 13, line 17, after the word "earnings," it is proposed to insert "of any year," so that it will read:

And thereafter when net earnings of any year exceed 12 per cent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. Also, on the same page, it is proposed to strike out lines 19 and 20 and to insert in lieu thereof the following words:

And 10 per cent of the remaining net earnings shall be paid into the surplus and 90 per cent shall be paid to the United States as an additional franchise tax.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator explain the purpose of the amendment he is tendering now?

Mr. LENROOT. Under this provision they are entitled to a normal dividend of 6 per cent. Out of the additional earnings they are required to build up a surplus. When the surplus amounts to 100 per cent of the subscribed capital, and when the earnings in any year exceed 12 per cent, they may declare an additional dividend of 3 per cent to the stockholders. Of anything then remaining, 10 per cent must go to additional surplus to build up the surplus further, and 90 per cent must go to the Treasury as a franchise tax.

Mr. KING. What is paid now as a franchise tax?

Mr. LENROOT. Part of it goes to surplus. The act has been amended, and I do not remember just what the present provision is.

Mr. McLEAN. The franchise tax is the surplus paid into the Treasury.

Mr. KING. May I address an inquiry to the Senator from Wisconsin, as well as the able chairman of the committee, about the criticisms which we have heard from time to time about the enormous earnings of the Federal reserve member banks?

The Senators know that criticisms have been made upon the floor of the Senate, and criticisms have frequently appeared in the press to the effect that during the past year or two the earnings of the members of the Federal reserve system—at least, some of them—have been extremely great; indeed, so great as to have led to the criticism that these banks were profiteering.

I express no opinion relative to those criticisms. I simply ask the chairman of the committee whether, in dealing with this question—the earnings of the Federal reserve banks, the disposition to be made of them, the amount to be paid in dividends, and the amount to be paid as a franchise tax—any investigation was made of these criticisms, and if the committee felt that there was any necessity of amending existing law other than in the particulars submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McLEAN. That criticism has been directed to the bill many times—the feeling that they were making too much money. The Senator knows that these profits do not affect the discount rate.

Mr. KING. No.

Mr. McLEAN. That is an entirely different matter, and must be fixed by some one, and must be paid in order to control the system, and the Senator will find that at the present time the profits are not large. They were necessarily large during the years of expansion, and the feeling of the committee was that it was pretty difficult to anticipate with regard to these profits. A good many of the banks, I think, are not making much of anything now, and inasmuch as this surplus goes into the Treasury of the United States, and does not affect the discount rate, the committee saw no reason for changing the law. It would not benefit the borrower in any way.

Mr. KING. The Senator recalls that the criticism went a little further, perhaps, than I indicate, namely, that in order rather to conceal their enormous profits they had been paying extravagant salaries to the employees of the banks, and, indeed, had been employing too many persons. I do not know that a consideration of that question would be pertinent or really germane to this bill; and yet I observe that attempts are made in this bill to amend the existing Federal reserve act in respect to a great many matters, and it occurred to me that if those criticisms had any justification it might be well to curb any evils that the committee may have found to exist in the administration of the law.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator knows that the commission of inquiry that was appointed more than a year ago went into that subject very carefully, and it was assumed that if any additional legislation was warranted it would have been suggested by that commission. No such recommendation was made, however, and if the Senator will read the testimony which was presented to that commission I think he will be satisfied that many of these insinuations and attacks upon the system, based upon the assumption that exorbitant salaries had been paid, were largely without foundation.

Mr. KING. It did seem to me that the criticism in regard to the actions of the board controlling the bank in New York had some foundation. It did seem to me that the amount proposed to be expended for the erection of a building was rather excessive, and that there seemed to be rather a disposition upon the part of the board of the bank in New York to treat their enterprise as one so absolutely divorced from the Federal Government or from Federal control as that the directors could do as they pleased with the proceeds, pay the dividends they pleased, pay the salaries they pleased, and expend an extravagant amount in the erection of buildings.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator allow me to make an observation there?

Mr. McLEAN. Certainly,

Mr. KING. That was the impression made upon me by revelations here in the Senate, and by the debate.

Mr. McLEAN. That has been explained many times. It was explained a few days ago by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], and I do not think there is very much foundation for the criticism.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There has been, as stated, a ruthless attack against the reserve bank in New York for putting up its building, and on account of the salaries it pays. As a matter of fact, the size of its business rivals that of the greatest banks in the city. Its salaries are less than the average paid by banks doing the same amount of business. The building it is putting up, on the basis of cost per cubic foot, is cheaper than the average bank building put up by a bank doing an equal amount of business. The attacks on it have been utterly unjustified.

Mr. KING. I have heard those attacks made.

Mr. WADSWORTH. So have I.

Mr. KING. And I have seen no refutation or any reply to the attacks. I may ask the Senator from Connecticut, in conclusion, as to this item, if as chairman of the committee he is satisfied with the amendment which has been offered, and if he feels that that deals with the subject now as comprehensively as the subject should be dealt with?

Mr. McLEAN. Certainly. These amendments were offered at my suggestion, and all of them were adopted as amendments to the Capper bill. They are necessary, unless the desire is to prevent the member banks from drawing any dividends on their subscriptions until the regional banks get 100 per cent surplus.

Mr. KING. I am not sufficiently advised to make such a recommendation.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, as the Senator from Wisconsin desires to reach a conclusion on the pending bill, I will submit a unanimous-consent request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the request.

The reading clerk read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that all debate upon the pending bill shall close at 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Monday, February 5, 1923, and that in the meantime no other legislation shall be considered unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Glass	McCumber	Smith
Ball	Gooding	McKellar	Spencer
Brookhart	Hale	McLean	Stanfield
Bursum	Harris	McNary	Sterling
Calder	Harrison	Nelson	Sutherland
Cameron	Johnson	New	Swanson
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Norbeck	Trammell
Colt	Kellogg	Norris	Wadsworth
Curtis	Kendrick	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Ernst	King	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Fernald	Ladd	Poindexter	Warren
Fletcher	Lenroot	Reed, Pa.	Watson
George	Lodge	Shields
Gerry	McCormick	Shortridge

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Secretary will report the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The reading clerk read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that all debate upon the pending bill shall close at 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Monday, February 5, 1923, and that in the meantime no other legislation shall be considered unless by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to entering into the proposed agreement?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I can not consent to fixing Monday. I may say to the Senator from Florida that I would be willing to enter into an agreement to close debate on Friday, but I can not consent to any later date than that.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest that perhaps we may get together and agree on a time. We do not want to have any more delay in this matter than we can avoid, and I suggest Saturday at 3 o'clock.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No. I am very anxious to get this farm legislation through; I think it ought to be passed at an early date. We can not get it through too early to meet the situation that will develop in the spring, and I am willing to fix a time on Friday.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I call the attention of the Senator from Washington to the fact, known to all Senators here, that on a Saturday very little work is done. It is very hard to keep a quorum of the Senate on Saturday, and I think if he will make it Saturday, we will get together. We would not save any time by fixing Friday. If the Senator would make it Saturday at 3 o'clock, I do not think there would be any objection, and we would get this bill out of the way and go on then to the consideration of other work.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, we ought to be here on Saturday doing the work of the session. I am willing to make it 3 o'clock or 4 o'clock on Friday, but I am not willing to go beyond Friday. I think that is very reasonable.

Mr. SMITH. Of course, that is merely an arbitrary distinction, if we are really and truly in earnest about saving time. I have served with the Senator a good long time, and I do not think either one of us has ever been guilty of trespassing upon the time of the Senate. I make a plea to him that in the interest of saving time we make it Saturday.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I plead with the Senator, in the interest of saving time and in the interest of saving night sessions, that we close it up on Friday.

Mr. SMITH. The proposition was to fix Monday as the date for a vote, and making it Saturday just splits the difference between Friday and Monday. Everything is arrived at by compromise. The Senator fixes Friday on the one side, and it was proposed on the other side to fix Monday, and I come in and split the difference.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The proposition was really to have night sessions beginning to-morrow night, and to try to limit debate to-morrow. That is what we are trying to do. I do not desire to be arbitrary, and I do not think I have been so; but I think it is best, if our minds are set on a matter, to frankly state it. I can not agree to fixing a later day than Friday.

Mr. HARRISON. Will not the Senator allow this question to be submitted to the Senate? There is a difference of opinion about it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is a matter of unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRISON. There are Senators on this side who do not want to agree to vote even on Monday, but we have tried to get together on Monday as the day when we shall vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington. There are Senators on this side who do not desire to agree to vote on Friday.

Mr. HARRISON. I was in hopes we could agree on this proposition, because it disarranges everything to have to meet here at night.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know that.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, it does not inconvenience some of us.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am willing to try to avoid it. Mr. HARRISON. We would save a good deal of time by agreeing to vote on Saturday, if we could get together on it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We can avoid the difficulty by agreeing to vote on Friday.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I doubt very much whether we would save any time by having night sessions.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That may be.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have very grave doubts about it.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Washington must realize that if we can not get together on something within reason, the whole situation is going to get very confusing. Nominations may be held up, confirmations held up, and an extra session may be brought on.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know the possibilities.

Mr. HARRISON. There are great possibilities, and we made a very fair proposition that debate on this bill shall stop on Monday. It was suggested by some one on the other side that the debate should stop on Saturday, and we agreed to that. Now, we are holding out on a difference of one day.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; and I certainly think the Senator should not do it.

Mr. HARRISON. I may not insist on it, but some other Senator will, and there you are.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hope they will not. I can not agree to vote later than Friday. I would like to get a vote at 4 o'clock on Friday, or agree that we shall take all the time we want on Friday, so that we will have an abundance of time to consider the bill and amendments.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, I do not care to press the matter if the Senator has made up his mind about it, but I was going to say that we were about at the close of the day on Tuesday—

Mr. JONES of Washington. We can run longer if we desire.

Mr. FLETCHER. We can run longer, and we can, of course, hold night sessions, if the majority insist on it. With reference to that, I am going to say that it is rather a serious proposal in my judgment, because with the town full of grippe and influenza, I am not going to endanger my life or jeopardize my health by attending night sessions of the Senate.

I do not know how others may feel with reference to the situation, but I feel very strongly that the mortality among Senators is great already, and, if we begin holding night sessions, there will be fewer of us here at the end of the Congress than there are to-day. It is really quite a serious matter. I do not think we ought to resort to that course at all. I believe it would take a great many Assistant Sergeant at Arms to bring Senators here for night sessions so as to be able to transact much business. Then there are various publications on the ship subsidy question that it will take a great deal of time to read. I doubt if we would save any time by resorting to night sessions.

I think the Senator from Washington ought to accept the proposition that is made as a compromise, because I thought at first Monday was the earliest time we could agree upon, but I find Senators are willing to concede the point and make it Saturday.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I agree with reference to the seriousness of night sessions. I do not want to have the Senate hold night sessions. I hope we can avoid it. I am willing now to make an attempt to agree on any time Friday, at any hour of the day up until 12 o'clock at night, if Senators think they ought to have that much time to consider the measure. It is an important measure. No doubt important amendments will be offered to it, and those amendments ought to have consideration. I want to have them given consideration, and I am willing to give all the time necessary to have them properly considered. In order to do that I am willing to remain in session to-day as long as Senators may desire, and give ample time to-morrow, also.

I hope Senators will agree to a conclusion of the debate on the bill. I ask leave to modify the request so to provide that debate shall be concluded on the bill not later than 5 o'clock Friday. That proposal is subject to any change Senators may desire to present.

Mr. FLETCHER. Would the Senator accept the suggestion that general debate on the bill shall close at 5 o'clock Friday and that debate on the amendments shall be limited to 5 minutes thereafter?

Mr. JONES of Washington. To be concluded on Friday?

Mr. KING. That is for the Senate to determine.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I can not consent to carrying the bill over Friday. I am perfectly willing to close debate any time on Friday.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us go on with the debate. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I believe there is already an order entered for a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow when the Senate concludes its business to-day?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order has been made.

Mr. HARRISON. How long does the Senator from Wisconsin expect to proceed this afternoon?

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to complete the formal amendments, anyway.

Mr. HARRISON. I move that the Senate take a recess, and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] and vote "yea."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] and vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] and vote "nay."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] and vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have a standing pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. NICHOLSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. ERNST. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER] and vote "nay."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD (after having voted in the negative). I notice that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] has not voted. Therefore I transfer my pair with that Senator to the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. GLASS. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] is absent on account of illness.

I wish also to announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] are absent on account of illness.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] is absent on official business. He stands paired on this vote with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. McKINLEY] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY];

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD];

The junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]; and

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 34, as follows:

YEAS—18.

Ashurst	Glass	La Follette	Swanson
Brookhart	Harris	McKellar	Trammell
Fletcher	Harrison	Norris	Walsh, Mass.
George	King	Shields
Gerry	Ladd	Smith

NAYS—34.

Ball	Hale	McNary	Spencer
Bursum	Johnson	Nelson	Stanfield
Calder	Jones, Wash.	New	Sterling
Capper	Kellogg	Norbeck	Sutherland
Colt	Leuroot	Oddie	Wadsworth
Curtis	Lodge	Philips	Warren
Ernst	McCormick	Polindexter	Watson
Fernald	McCumber	Reed, Pa.
Gooding	McLean	Shortridge

NOT VOTING—44.

Bayard	Edge	Moses	Robinson
Borah	Elkins	Myers	Sheppard
Brandeggee	France	Nicholson	Simmons

Cummins	Kendrick	Pomerene	Weller
Dial	Keyes	Ransdell	Williams
Dillingham	McKinley	Reed, Mo.	Willis

So the Senate refused to take a recess.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Was the amendment striking out lines 19 and 20, on page 13, agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. And the amendment to strike out and insert was agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was.

Mr. LENROOT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 17, after line 18, it is proposed to insert a new paragraph, as follows:

Any Federal reserve bank may also buy and sell debentures and other such obligations issued by a Federal land bank under Title II of the Federal farm loan act, but only to the same extent as and subject to the same limitation as those upon which it may buy and sell bonds issued under Title I of said act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. On page 17, at the beginning of line 20, I move to strike out the word "cooperating" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "cooperative." That amendment is merely to correct a misprint.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. On page 18, at the end of line 12, I move to insert the word "for."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 18, at the end of line 12, after the word "eligible," it is proposed to insert the word "for"; so that it will read:

Any other class of paper of such associations which is now eligible for rediscout.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, there is one other amendment about which I have not consulted the chairman of the committee, but I am sure he will not object to it. On page 12, line 4, after the word "shall," I move to insert the words "be deemed and be held to be instrumentalities of the Government and shall."

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator from Wisconsin to state just what the effect of that amendment, if agreed to, will be?

Mr. LENROOT. That is the language of the present farm loan act with reference to farm loan bonds and farm land banks. I was just a little afraid that without that recital the constitutional question might arise. That is avoided in the present farm loan act by reason of those words being inserted, and I wish the same words to apply to this recital of fact, as well as to the other. The amendment is proposed merely to avoid any constitutional question.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is designed to make that rule apply to the debentures to be issued under this proposed act?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that is a very good amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. Those are all the amendments, I think, Mr. President, which I now wish to offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LENROOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously made, took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 31, 1923, at 12 o'clock m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 30 (legislative day of January 29), 1923.

SECRETARIES OF EMBASSIES OR LEGATIONS.

CLASS 4.

The following-named persons to be secretaries of embassy or legation of class 4 of the United States of America:

Gustave Pabst, jr., of Wisconsin.

Rees H. Barkalow, of New Jersey.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE.

Charles L. McKeehan, of Pennsylvania, to be United States district judge, eastern district of Pennsylvania. (An additional position created by the act approved September 14, 1922.)

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate January 30 (legislative day of January 29), 1923.

ENVOY EXTRAORDINARY AND MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 30, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, we are not alone with Thee. He who considers the lily and notes the sparrow's fall has said to all men, "Come unto me." Bestow upon us this day the blessings of a free mind and an untroubled heart. Help us to forgive our enemies, to encourage the ignorant, to relieve the distressed, and to share with others the common fruits of toil. We thank Thee for the freedom of government and for the blessings that hallow the paths of our citizenship. Bless all educational, charitable, and religious institutions; may they go on unimpaired to higher usefulness. May every day bring to us, to our homes, and to our whole land the fragrant flowers of love, joy, patience, and good will. Through Christ, our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report (H. Rept. 1477) and accompanying statement on the legislative appropriation bill for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois presents the conference report and accompanying statement on the legislative appropriation bill for printing under the rule. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Conference report on the bill (H. R. 13926) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed under the rule.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4358. An act to authorize the American Niagara Railroad Corporation to build a bridge across the Niagara River between the State of New York and the Dominion of Canada;

S. 4387. An act to authorize the building of a bridge across the Tugaloo River between South Carolina and Georgia; and

S. 4398. An act in recognition of the valor of the officers and men of the Seventy-ninth Division who were killed in action or died of wounds received in action.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13926) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1690) to correct the military record of John Sullivan.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the amendments of the Senate numbered 11, 31, and 35 to the bill (H. R. 13481) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, had receded from its amendment numbered 34 to said bill. That the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33 to said bill, had further insisted upon its said amendment, had requested a further conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. McNARY, Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. SMITH as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Senate Resolution 422.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. PHILANDER C. KNOX, late a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

Senate Resolution 423.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. BOIES PENROSE, late a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

Senate Resolution 424.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. WILLIAM E. CROW, late a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay tribute to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate Resolution 425.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. SHERMAN E. BURROUGHS, late a Representative from the State of New Hampshire.

Resolved, That a committee of six Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

And that the Vice President, under the second resolution, had appointed Mr. MOSES, Mr. KEYES, Mr. HARRELD, Mr. MCKINLEY, Mr. BAYARD, and Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts members of the committee on the part of the Senate.

COLORADO RIVER PACT.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing in 8-point type some information that I have gathered relative to the Colorado River compact.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the matter indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Are they the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. HAYDEN. They are partly my own remarks, but otherwise they are questions and answers relative to the pact, addressed to Mr. Hoover, chairman of the commission, and Mr. Davis, Chief Engineer, and others. The data that I have gathered, I am sure, will be of interest to the House as well as to the people of the seven States of the Colorado River Basin.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extension of remarks referred to is here printed in full as follows:

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, the Colorado River compact is of immediate and intense interest to the people of the seven States of the basin of that mighty river, and the Nation as a whole will soon realize its importance. This is the first time that so large a number of States have sought a unanimous agreement upon a question which vitally affects their common welfare. Very naturally there has been a desire to secure all the information that could possibly be obtained not only as to the true meaning of the terms of the compact but also as to its effect when approved. In the hope that I might aid in this quest for knowledge, I have addressed a number of inquiries to those in the service of the Federal Government who are best qualified to speak on this subject. First among them is Hon. Herbert Hoover, who served as chairman of the Colorado River Commission, which drafted the compact. His reply is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 27, 1923.

HON. CARL HAYDEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HAYDEN: Referring to your letter of January 9 addressed to the Secretary, inclosing questionnaire on the Colorado River compact, I am requested by Mr. Hoover to forward to you his answers to the questions which you propounded. Very truly yours,

CLARENCE C. STETSON,
Executive Secretary, Colorado River Commission.

Question 1. What was the reason for dividing the drainage area of the Colorado River and its tributaries into two basins, as provided in Article II of the Colorado River compact?

The reasons were:

(a) The commission, upon analysis, found that the causes of present friction and of major future disputes lay between the lower basin States and the upper basin States, and that very little likelihood of friction lay between the States within each basin; that the delays to development at the present time are wholly interbasinal disputes; and that major development is not likely to be impeded by disputes between the States within each basin. And in any event, the compact provides machinery for such settlements.

(b) The drainage area falls into two basins naturally, from a geographical, hydrographical, and an economic point of view. They are separated by over 500 miles of barren canyon which serves as the neck of the funnel, into which the drainage area comprised in the upper basin pours its waters, and these waters again spread over the lands of the lower basin.

(c) The climate of the two basins is different; that of the upper basin being, generally speaking, temperate, while that of the lower basin ranges from semitropical to tropical. The growing seasons, the crops, and the quantity of water consumed per acre are therefore different.

(d) The economic conditions in the two basins are entirely different. The upper basin will be slower of development than the lower basin. The upper basin will secure its waters more by diversion than by storage, whereas the development of the lower basin is practically altogether a storage problem.

(e) The major friction at the present moment is over the water rights which might be established by the erection of adequate storage in the lower basin, as prejudicing the situation in the upper basin, and regardless of legal rights in either case. The States are now divided into two groups in opposition to each other legislatively, with little hope of the cohesion that is necessary before Federal aid can ever be secured.

The use of the group method of division was therefore adopted both from necessity, as being the only practical one, and from advisability, being dictated by the conditions existing in the entire basin.

Question 2. Was the apportionment in Article III of the compact between the upper and lower basins arbitrary or was it based on the actual requirements of each basin?

The apportionment was not arbitrary. It was based on a careful consideration of respective needs of the two basins. The data available was the estimates provided by the Reclamation Service, which follow, showing the total new and old acreage in the two basins, including not only all existing projects but all projects considered economically feasible and also those of doubtful feasibility and intended to cover every prospective development during the next 75 years. The commissioners and engineering staffs of the different States varied somewhat from the basic estimates of the Reclamation Service, and some compromise from these figures was agreed to by the commission to compensate in different directions. This was particularly the case with regard to the estimated consumption of water per acre. It will be noted that the total acreage in the lower basin, present and prospective, is given as 2,127,000, whereas that in the upper basin is given as 4,000,000. Therefore the amount of water depends partly on the consumption assumed per acre, and after general consideration an addition was made in each case to cover any possible mischances of calculation, the general addition being about 30 per cent more than the probable use.

Table of Colorado River acreage.

	Acreage irrigated 1920.	New acreage.	Total acreage.
Lower basin:
Arizona.....	507,000	640,000	1,147,000
California.....	450,000	490,000	940,000
Nevada.....	5,000	35,000	40,000
Total.....	962,000	1,165,000	2,127,000
Upper basin:
Colorado.....	740,000	1,018,000	1,758,000
New Mexico.....	34,000	483,000	517,000
Utah.....	350,000	456,000	815,000
Wyoming.....	367,000	543,000	910,000
Total.....	1,500,000	2,500,000	4,000,000

Question 3. Why was 40 years fixed as the time for a future apportionment of the surplus water of the Colorado River?

There was a decided conflict between the States over the period to be fixed in this paragraph, based chiefly on their ideas as to rapidity of development and actual use of the water. Some desired a shorter and some a longer time. Suggestions were made varying from 20 to 60 years. The 40-year period was finally arrived at as a common point of agreement. Judging by experience under other projects—the Imperial Valley and Salt River Valley, for instance—the full development of contemplated construction, as shown in the table following question 2, will take a much longer time than the one fixed.

Question 4. Why was the term "Colorado River system" used in paragraph (a) of Article III, wherein 7,500,000 acre-feet of water is apportioned to the upper and lower basins, respectively?

This term is defined in Article II as covering the entire river and its tributaries in the United States. No other term could be used, as the duty of the commission was to divide all the water of the river. It serves to make it clear that this was what the commission intended to do and prevents any State from contending that, since a certain tributary rises and empties within its boundaries and is therefore not an interstate stream, it may use its waters without reference to the terms of the compact. The plan covers all the waters of the river and all its tributaries, and the term referred to leaves that situation beyond doubt.

Question 5. Why is the basis of division changed from the "Colorado River system" to the "river at Lee Ferry" in paragraph (d) of Article III, the period of time extended to 10 years and the number of acre-feet multiplied by 10?

(a) I do not think there is any change in the basis of division as the result of the difference in language in Articles III (a) and III (b). The two mean the same. By reference to Article II (f) it will be seen that Lee Ferry, referred to in III (d), is the determining point in the creation of the two basins specified in III (a). The use of this term makes it plain that the 75,000,000 acre-feet are to be delivered in the main channel of the river above the various tributaries which contribute water below.

(b) The agreement as to the flow of 75,000,000 acre-feet at Lee Ferry during each 10-year period fixes a definite quantity of water which must pass that point. Under III (a) each basin is entitled to the use of 7,500,000 acre-feet annually. Judging by past records, there will always be sufficient flow in the river to supply these quantities, but in the improbable event of a deficiency, the lower basin has the first call on the water up to a total use of 75,000,000 acre-feet each 10 years. While there was in the commission a firm belief that no such shortage will ever occur, still this provision was adopted as a matter of caution. The period of 10 years was fixed as a basis of measurement, as being long enough to allow equalization between years of high and low flow, and as representing a basis fair to both divisions.

Question 6. Are the 1,000,000 additional acre-feet of water apportioned to the lower basin in paragraph (b) of Article III supposed to be obtained from the Colorado River or solely from the tributaries of that stream within the State of Arizona?

The use of the words "such waters" in this paragraph clearly refers to waters from the Colorado River system, and the extra 1,000,000 acre-feet provided for can therefore be taken from the main river or from any of its tributaries.

Question 7. If more than 1,000,000 acre-feet of water are beneficially used and consumed annually on the tributaries of the Colorado River in Arizona, will the excess above that amount be charged against the 75,000,000 acre-feet of water to be delivered at Lee Ferry during any 10-year period, as provided in paragraph (d) of Article III? In other words, will the use of any amount of water from the tributaries of the Colorado below Lee Ferry in any way relieve the States of the upper division from their obligation not to cause the flow of the river to be depleted below 75,000,000 acre-feet in any period of 10 consecutive years?

I can see no connection between the use of waters in Arizona from Colorado River tributaries and the obligation of the upper States to deliver the 75,000,000 acre-feet each 10 years at Lee Ferry. Their undertaking in this respect is separate and independent and without reference to place of use or quantity of water obtained from any other source. On the face of this paragraph this amount of water must be delivered even though not used at all. The obligation certainly can not be diminished by the fact that Arizona obtains other water from another source. The contract is to deliver a definite amount of water at a definite point above the inflow of various important tributaries, and I find nothing in the compact which modifies this obligation, except the general limitation as to use, which is hereafter referred to.

Question 8. As a matter of fact more than 1,000,000 acre-feet of water from the tributaries of the Colorado below Lee Ferry are now being beneficially used and consumed within the State of Arizona. Will the excess above that amount be accounted for as a part of the 75,000,000 acre-feet first apportioned to the lower basin from the waters of the "Colorado River system" as provided in paragraph (a) of Article III?

By the provisions of paragraphs (a) and (b), Article III, the lower basin is entitled to the use of a total of 8,500,000 acre-feet per annum from the entire Colorado River system, the main river and its tributaries. All use of water in that basin, including the waters of tributaries entering the river below Lee Ferry, must be included within this quantity. The relation is reciprocal. Water used from these tributaries falls within the 8,500,000 acre-feet quota. Water obtained from them does not come within the 75,000,000 acre-feet 10-year period flow delivered at Lee Ferry, but remains available for use over and above that amount.

Question 9. Does paragraph (c) of Article III contemplate a treaty between the United States and the Republic of Mexico under which one-half of a deficiency of water for the irrigation of lands in Mexico shall be supplied from reservoirs in Arizona?

No. Paragraph (c) of Article III does not contemplate any treaty. It recognizes the possibility that a treaty may, at some time, be made and that under it Mexico may become entitled to the use of some water, and divides the burden in such an event, but the quantity to which that country may become entitled and the manner, terms, and conditions upon which such use may depend, can not be foreseen. It is a certainty that no such treaty will be negotiated and ratified which is unfair to the United States or any State or detrimental to their interests. To discuss whether or not a treaty might be made under which Mexico might be permitted to receive water impounded in a reservoir which may be constructed, is to indulge in speculation, but it is safe to say that if such a situation should result it will be only under conditions fair and satisfactory to all parties concerned.

Question 10. What is the estimated quantity of water which constitutes the undivided surplus of the annual flow of the Colorado River and may the compact be construed to mean that no part of this surplus can be beneficially used or consumed in either the upper or the lower basins until 1963, so that the entire quantity above the apportionment must flow into Mexico, where it may be used for irrigation and thus create a prior right to water which the United States would be bound to recognize at the end of the 40-year period?

(a) The unapportioned surplus is estimated at from 4,000,000 to 6,000,000 acre-feet, but may be taken as approximately 5,000,000 acre-feet.

(b) The right to the use of unapportioned or surplus water is not covered by the compact. The question can not arise until all the waters apportioned are appropriated and used, and this will not be until after the lapse of a long period of time, perhaps 75 years. Assuming that each basin should reach the limit of its allotment and there should still be water unapportioned, in my opinion, such water could be taken and used in either basin under the ordinary rules governing appropriations, and such appropriations would doubtless receive formal recognition by the commission at the end of the 40-year period. There is certainly nothing in the compact which requires any water whatever to run unused to Mexico, or which recognizes any Mexican rights, the only reference to that situation being the expression of the realization that some such rights may perhaps in the future be established by treaty. As I understand the matter, the United States is not "bound to recognize" any such rights of a foreign country unless based upon treaty stipulations.

Question 11. Is there any possibility that water stored by dams in the tributaries of the Colorado River in Arizona, such as the Roosevelt Reservoir, on the Salt River, or the San Carlos Reservoir, on the Gila, might, under the terms of such a treaty, be released for use in Mexico to the injury of the water users of the projects for whose benefit such dams were constructed?

I can not conceive of the making or the ratification of a treaty which would have such an effect. If it were possible to believe that the Federal Government would treat its own citizens with such absolute disregard of their property and rights, I presume that they would receive ample protection even as against the Government, under the provisions of the Federal Constitution.

It must be remembered that the United States now has a large financial interest in the projects already constructed. It is not to be presumed that action will be taken detrimental to these interests. Furthermore, each of the seven States directly concerned has two Members of the Senate, by which any treaty proposed must be ratified.

Question 12. Is it true, as has been asserted, that, if the Colorado River compact be approved, the water which should reclaim 2,500,000 acres of land in Arizona will go to Mexico and there irrigate a vast area owned by American speculators who will cultivate the same with Asiatic coolie labor and raise cheap crops in competition with Arizona and California farmers?

If such assertions have been made, there is absolutely nothing in the compact upon which they can be based. They are the result solely of unrestrained and unfounded imagination. As already stated, there is no reference in the compact to any rights of any persons in Mexico; none are created and none are recognized. That entire question, if it ever arises, must be dealt with by the Federal Government in the exercise of its treaty-making power. Such a subject was beyond the purview of the acts creating the commission, and it was intentionally omitted from the compact.

Question 13. Objection has been made to paragraph (d) of Article III in that it authorizes the withholding of an indefinite amount of water by the States of the upper division during a drought which might extend over two or three years. If the drought should be broken by heavy rains the ensuing floods would provide the total of 75,000,000 acre-feet within the 10 years, but water would be denied to the lower basin when most needed and oversupplied when not needed. In your opinion, does this provision of the compact seriously menace the proper and maximum development of irrigation projects in the lower basin?

In my opinion, the provision about which you ask does not menace the proper and maximum development of irrigation projects in the lower basin.

The future development of the Colorado River Basin is dependent wholly upon the creation of storage. The lower States have certainly reached the limit of development by the direct diversion of the flow of the river. Reservoirs are imperative. They must be of sufficient size not merely to equalize the annual flow, but to impound the excessive floods of one year to supply a deficiency resulting from a following lean year. Such construction will obviate, to a great extent, the likelihood of the situation you suggest. Furthermore, there can not be a drought or lack of water in the lower States without a similar condition in the upper. A shortage of water below can only be caused by lack of rainfall above. It is inconceivable that any upper State would attempt to store and withhold water it did not need. Such action would not be permitted under the ordinary rules of law and is prohibited by the compact itself. If the water is used in the upper States, the return flow, ultimately large in quantity, necessarily runs down the stream. The large reservoir sites capable of impounding the flow for more than one year are in the lower, not the upper, basin, and it would be a physical impossibility for the upper States to withhold all the flow of the river for any long period, even if they desired to do so. For these reasons, I answer this question in the negative.

Question 14. Can paragraph (d) of Article III be construed to mean that the States of the upper division may withhold all except 75,000,000 acre-feet of water within any period of 10 years and thus not only secure the amount to which they are entitled under the apportionment made in paragraph (a) but also the entire unapportioned surplus waters of the Colorado River?

No. Paragraph (a) of Article III apportions to the upper basin 7,500,000 acre-feet per annum. Paragraph (e) of Article III provides that the States of the upper division shall not withhold water that can not be beneficially used. Paragraphs (f) and (g) of this article specifically leave to further apportionment water now unapportioned. There is, therefore, no possibility of construing paragraph (d) of this article as suggested.

Question 15. Does paragraph (d) of Article III in any way modify the obligation of the States of the upper division, as expressed in paragraph (c), to permit the surplus and unapportioned waters to flow down in satisfaction of any right to water which may hereafter be accorded by treaty to Mexico? Within any year of a 10-year period, could the States of the upper division shift to the States of the lower division the entire burden of supplying such water to Mexico?

(a) No. It is provided in the compact that the upper States shall add their share of any Mexican burden to the delivery to be made at Lee Ferry, whenever any Mexican rights shall be established by treaty. By paragraph (c) of Article III, such an amount of water is to be delivered in addition to the 75,000,000 acre-feet otherwise provided for.

(b) In the face of the specific provision of Article III (c) that the burden of any deficiency must be "equally borne," I can see no possibility of placing upon the lower division the entire burden. If the surplus is sufficient, there is no burden on anyone. If it is insufficient the plain language is that it must be equally shared, with the equally plain provision that the upper division must furnish its half.

Question 16. Why is it that provision is made in paragraph (f) of Article III for a further apportionment, after 40 years, of the waters of the Colorado River system unapportioned by paragraphs (a), (b) and (c), but that no provision is made for a revision of the terms relating to the flow of the Colorado River at Lee Ferry, as set forth in paragraph (d)?

No such special provision was necessary. All that the present commission has done has been by virtue of its power "to divide and apportion equitably" the waters of the river. By specifying in this compact the powers of the second commission in identical language the same powers are necessarily granted, and that commission may do whatever this one could, subject only to noninterference with individual rights which may have become vested under this agreement. It was therefore not considered necessary to specify powers in detail, since the grant of the general power includes the particular.

In this connection it must be remembered that the further compact at the end of 40 years can be entered into only by unanimous agreement of the States. Given such unanimity, anything desired may be done and any existing provisions modified or annulled.

Question 17. In your opinion, will the States of the upper division or the States of the lower division benefit most by the terms of paragraph (c) of Article III when the same are in actual operation?

This paragraph applies only to an unreasonable or arbitrary withholding or demand. I do not anticipate either arbitrary action or unreasonableness on the part of any of the States concerned. The upper States can gain nothing by withholding water not needed, nor can the lower States gain by demanding water for which they have no use. The paragraph is of value as an expression of the prohibition of such action, but I doubt if it is ever called into practical effect.

Question 18. Why is the use of the waters of the Colorado River for navigation made subservient to domestic, agricultural, and power uses, as provided in paragraph (a) of Article IV?

This article is an expression of the views of the commission as to the relative importance of the uses to which the waters of the river may be devoted. It is recognized that on many streams navigation is a paramount use, but on this particular river navigation is negligible in fact. As expressed in the language adopted, the river "has ceased to be navigable for commerce." This is a true statement of the existing situation. Below Yuma there is but little water in the river bed. The Laguna Dam, above Yuma, has made navigation between points above and below it physically impossible, and the construction of further dams in the development of the river will prevent navigation at other points, even if it were now physically possible. Power structures, irrigation dams and navigation can not conveniently exist together. It was therefore felt that the very great possible use of this water for power and irrigation far outweighed in economic importance the very slight and largely theoretical use which might be made for navigation, and this paragraph was drafted accordingly.

Question 19. Why is the impounding of water for power purposes made subservient to its use and consumption for agricultural and domestic purposes, as provided in paragraph (b) of Article IV?

(a) Because such subordination conforms to established law, either by constitution or statute, in most of the semi-arid States. This provision frees the farmer from the danger of damage suits by power companies in the event of conflict between them.

(b) Because the cultivation of land naturally outranks in importance the generation of power, since it is the most important of human activities, the foundation upon which all other industries finally rest.

(c) Because there was a general agreement by all parties appearing before the commission, including those representing power interests, that such preference was proper.

Question 20. Will this subordination of the development of hydroelectric power to domestic and agricultural uses, combined with the apportionment of 7,500,000 acre-feet of water to the upper basin, utterly destroy an asset of the State of Arizona consisting of 3,000,000 horsepower, which it is said could otherwise be developed within that State if the Colorado River continues to flow, undiminished in volume, across its northern boundary line and through the Grand Canyon?

(a) The subordination of power to agriculture will only diminish power in the case that it is necessary to stop the entire flow of the river at some lower dam at some particular season of the year in order to create reserves for the agricultural community. The normal engineering development of the river will proceed by various dams, of which the dam lowest down would be the only one where there would be the remotest probability of a complete stoppage of water flow. Indeed, this could not happen for at least a hundred years, as it would contemplate a development of acreage in the Lower Basin far beyond anything now dreamed of.

(b) The adequate development of power can only be obtained through the erection of storage and through the irrigation of the Upper Basin. Storage dams can be erected both in the lower and upper canyon in such a fashion as to secure an average flow of the water throughout the entire year, and thus the maximum power developed. The irrigation of the Upper Basin, as explained above, acts itself as a reservoir regulating the flow of the river, increasing the minimum flow, and thus increasing the average power.

(c) Obviously, the use of the water for irrigation in the upper basin must in some degree diminish the volume of power in the lower basin, even though the lower river were entirely regulated to secure an even flow of the water. But it can not be pretended that the upper basin is to be denied the right to the use of the water for agricultural purposes because of power demands in the lower basin. Such a pretension would not be supported in any of the courts, and if set up in the lower basin would mean that the basin will not be developed so long as the upper States can exert any legislative influence whatever. As a matter of fact, the power possibilities of the river are in no way diminished by the compact, unless it is to be assumed that there is not to be an equitable division of water.

(d) The compact provides that no water is to be withheld above that can not be used for purposes of agriculture. The lower basin will therefore receive the entire flow of the river, less only the amount consumptively used in the upper States for agricultural purposes.

(e) The contention that the Colorado River is to continue to flow undiminished in volume across the northern boundary line of Arizona is a contention that the upper States shall have no rights to irrigation. It is a direct negation of both equity and human rights.

Question 21. Paragraph (c) of Article IV states that that article shall not interfere with the control by any State over the appropriation, use, and distribution of water within its own boundaries. Does this imply that the remainder of the compact may interfere with such intrastate control?

This article seems the only one of the compact which might affect the relations of citizens of one State with each other, and it was therefore considered advisable to add the clause to which your question refers. I do not believe, however, that its insertion in this article would, by implication or otherwise, preclude the complete control by each State of its own internal affairs.

Question 22. Does the Colorado River compact apportion any water to the State of Arizona?

No, nor to any other State individually. The apportionment is to the groups.

Question 23. In case of disagreements between the States of Arizona, California or Nevada as to a division among them of the waters of the Colorado River system apportioned by the compact to the lower basin, what procedure will be followed and what rules will govern the settlement of such differences?

This situation would be covered by Article VI. If its provisions are not sufficient or not satisfactory, then the dispute would be settled in the same way as other interstate conflicts now are, either by negotiation or agreement or by litigation.

Question 24. What was the necessity for Article VII relating to the obligations of the United States to Indian tribes?

This article was perhaps unnecessary. It is merely a declaration that the States, in entering into the agreement, disclaim any intention of affecting the performance of any obligations owing by the United States to Indians. It is presumed that the States have no power to disturb these relations, and it was thought wise to declare that no such result was intended.

Question 25. Article VIII is somewhat confusing to me and I would like to have your interpretation of its meaning. Why is the term "storage capacity" used? Does the capacity of a reservoir to hold water necessarily mean that it will be filled? If this "storage capacity" is destroyed by the reservoir filling with silt, are all rights to the use of water in the lower basin likewise destroyed? Why was so small a figure as 5,000,000 acre-feet agreed upon as the measure of this "capacity"?

(a) The first sentence of this paragraph is a recognition of the validity of present perfected rights to the use of waters and is inserted to obviate any fears on the part of present users that their rights might be impaired by the compact.

(b) The second sentence covers the situation now existing on the lower river. It is claimed that the entire low-water flow of the river has now been appropriated by users in California and Arizona, that rights to its continued and unimpaired flow have vested, and that any interference with these rights by attempted appropriation in the upper States could be prevented by appropriate legal proceedings. If such rights do exist, under the provisions of this paragraph they continue unimpaired until the use of water by direct diversion is substituted by its use through storage, at which time the enforcement of any rights to low-water flow for direct diversion obviously becomes unnecessary. When adequate storage has been provided, disputes over low-water flow necessarily cease. Five million acre-feet of storage is ample to provide water for all existing appropriations in the lower basin, and since it was intended only to meet the situation there it was agreed to. It is in no sense a limitation upon the size of the works to be built nor even an expression of opinion of the capacity to be adopted.

There can be no reasonable doubt in the mind of anyone as to the supply of water for a reservoir of this capacity. Given the capacity, the filling of the reservoir will result as a matter of course and physical necessity.

The rights to the use of the water in the lower basin are in no way dependent upon the construction of this or any other storage. The clause in question affects only rights to the direct diversion of low-water flow. The apportionment of water between the basins and the guaranty of quantity by the upper States have no relation to this situation, and whether storage is or is not provided, whether or not reservoirs fill with silt, the apportionment and mutual obligations as to division of water remain unaffected and unimpaired.

Question 26. All of these questions have been asked primarily with a view to obtaining first-hand information for the benefit of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, which now has the Colorado River compact under consideration. Any further observations that you may care to make will, therefore, be appreciated.

It seems to me a primary fact that the legislative action necessary for appropriations from Congress can not be secured nor construction work established at any point unless an equitable division of the waters of the Colorado River is first accomplished. There are only two methods of doing this; one is by compact and the other is by litigation. If this compact is not ratified it is necessary to start the process all over again, and I can see little hope of any more constructive basis of handling the problem than this compact already embraces.

The minor objections to the compact are generally based on exploitation of theoretical figures, without a full appreciation of the physical facts that govern the flow of the Colorado River. I have found that careful consideration of these physical surroundings of the river dissipate fear whenever they are carefully inquired into.

It is to be remembered also that until the dams are constructed the present flood menace will continue to threaten the Yuma project, the Imperial Valley, and other Arizona and California territory adjacent to the river on its lower reaches.

ANSWERS BY MR. ARTHUR P. DAVIS.

No engineer in America has made so great a study of the Colorado River as Arthur P. Davis, Director of the United States Reclamation Service. Under his supervision over a quarter of a million dollars has been expended in searching for the facts which are the basis of his conclusions as to what should be done in order to completely control and utilize the waters of that stream. For nearly 20 years he has had supervision over all the constructive work of the Reclamation Service, which includes the building of more great storage reservoirs than has been done by any other government in the world. This wide experience, therefore, qualifies Mr. Davis better than anyone else to answer the engineering questions which I have propounded.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES RECLAMATION SERVICE,
Washington, January 30, 1923.

HON. CARL HAYDEN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HAYDEN: Reference is made to your letter of January 8, inclosing a list of questions relating to the Colorado River compact as it affects the State of Arizona.

Inclosed please find original and two carbon copies of our replies to the above questions.

Yours very truly,

A. P. DAVIS, Director.

(Inclosures.)

Question 1. Referring to paragraphs (a), (f), and (g) of Article II of the Colorado River compact as to waters diverted from drainage area of the Colorado River and its tributaries in the States of Colorado, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming.

Question 1-A. How many acre-feet of water are now so diverted annually and where is such water being used?

Answer 1-A. The following table gives the present trans-mountain diversion from the Colorado River watershed, showing the average annual diversion in acre-feet:

Utah:	Acre-feet.
Strawberry River to Provo River.....	4,500
Strawberry River to Spanish Fork River.....	78,000
Price River to Spanish Fork River.....	1,500
Virgin River to Pinto Creek.....	23,000
Total, Utah.....	107,000

Colorado:	Acre-feet.
Colorado (Grand) to Cache la Poudre.....	15,000
Fraser to Clear Creek.....	500
Blue to Tarryall.....	800
Eagle to Arkansas.....	1,200
Cochetopa to Rio Grande.....	2,500
Total, Colorado.....	20,000

Total acre-feet existing diversions, upper basin..... 127,000

Question 1-B. Where are the proposed projects which contemplate additional diversions from the upper basin and the estimated cost of the same?

Answer 1-B. In Senate Document 142, the following proposed diversions are listed, all in Colorado. No cost data are available:

Proposed diversion (acre-feet annually):	Acre-feet.
Colorado (Grand) to Cache la Poudre (irrigation).....	10,000
Fraser to Clear Creek or South Boulder (municipal and irrigation, Denver).....	110,000
Williams Fork to Clear Creek (municipal and irrigation, Denver).....	50,000
Blue and tributaries to South Platte (municipal and irrigation, Denver).....	100,000
Eagle and tributaries to Arkansas.....	40,000
Extensions to existing diversions, irrigation.....	7,000
Total, Colorado.....	317,000

Question 1-C. What is the probable amount of water that will be diverted annually from the upper basin in the future?

Answer 1-C. It does not appear probable that any large increase will take place in diversions from the upper basin in the near future. The only one that can be reasonably included as at all "probable" at the present time would be the proposed Fraser River diversion of 110,000 acre-feet for the Denver City water supply. For purposes of computation, however, we have included the entire amount as listed above.

	Acre-feet.
Present diversions.....	127,000
Proposed diversions.....	317,000
Total.....	444,000

Question 2. As to waters diverted from the drainage area of the Colorado River and its tributaries in the States of Arizona, California, and Nevada.

Question 2-A. Is any other such diversion proposed except into the Imperial and Coachella Valleys?

Answer 2-A. No data are at hand in regard to any proposed diversion from the drainage area of the Colorado River in the States of Arizona, California, or Nevada unless the Imperial Valley diversion be so considered.

Question 2-B. How many acre-feet of water are now being used annually in the Imperial Valley?

Answer 2-B. The present annual diversion of the Imperial Valley Canal is given as follows:

Imperial irrigation district system:	Acre-feet.
United States land.....	1,597,000
Mexican lands.....	540,000
Main canal waste.....	580,000
Losses in Alamo Channel.....	173,000

Total diversion..... 2,890,000

Question 2-C. How many acre-feet of water will be required to irrigate all of the lands that it is feasible to bring under cultivation in the Imperial and Coachella Valleys?

Answer 2-C. Net ultimate acreage in Imperial irrigation district in the United States and Coachella Valley is given in Senate Document 142, page 48, as 785,000 acres, and, using the duty of water stated in that report, the total requirement would be 3,400,000 acre-feet.

Question 2-D. What is the estimated cost of the All-American Canal and other works for the irrigation of these lands?

Answer 2-D. Senate Document 142, page 86, gives estimated total cost of the All-American Canal and other works as $49,191,000.

Question 3. What are the present, the probable, and the maximum possible number of acre-feet of water that may be used for irrigation from the Colorado River system in each of the four States of the upper division?

Answer 3. The following table answers the question, the quantities being in acre-feet:

Use of Colorado River, upper basin.

Upper basin.	Acreage irrigated, 1920.	Consumption of water.	New acreage.	Consumption of water.	Total acreage.	Total consumption of water.
Colorado.....	740,000	1,184,000	1,018,000	1,527,000	1,758,000	2,711,000
New Mexico.....	34,000	54,400	483,000	724,500	517,000	778,900
Utah.....	359,000	574,400	456,000	684,000	815,000	1,258,400
Wyoming.....	367,000	587,200	543,000	814,500	910,000	1,401,700
Total.....	1,500,000	2,400,000	2,500,000	3,750,000	4,000,000	6,150,000

Of the above "new acreage" total of 2,500,000 acres, it is estimated in Senate Document 142, page 33, that a total of 1,008,000 acres will be irrigated in the upper basin in the near future.

Question 4. If the maximum quantity of water is diverted for irrigation in the upper basin, how much of it will return to the river by seepage and drainage and be available for use at Lee Ferry?

Answer 4. Above figures are based upon an average figure for "consumptive use"; that is, diversion minus return flow, and are believed to be large enough to include evaporation from local reservoirs which will be used for irrigation. They therefore represent the net reduction in the flow of the river to be anticipated under the assumed conditions.

Question 5. After deducting the maximum quantity of water that may be diverted out of the upper basin and the maximum amount that may be consumed by irrigation and domestic uses, what is your estimate of the average annual run-off from the upper basin in acre-feet at Lee Ferry?

Answer 5.—

	Acre-feet.
Mean discharge at Lee Ferry, 1903-1920 (assumed same as Laguna).....	16,400,000
Past depletion, upper basin, 1,094,000 acres (average) at 1.54 acre-feet per acre.....	1,700,000
Reconstructed river at Lee Ferry.....	18,100,000
Upper basin:
Maximum consumption.....	6,150,000
Diversion out of basin.....	444,000
	6,590,000

Remaining flow at Lee Ferry..... 11,510,000

Question 6. If the same maximum deductions are made from the quantity of water in the Colorado River when that stream had the least recorded annual flow, how many acre-feet would remain for use in the lower basin?

Answer 6. The above maximum deductions could not be made when the Colorado had its least recorded annual flow because sufficient water would not be available in the tributaries for maximum diversion. Assuming that the consumptive use would be reduced 25 per cent during this shortest year, and taking the flow at Lee Ferry, the same as that at Laguna, as given on page 5 of Senate Document 142, we have—

	Acre-feet.
Discharge at Lee Ferry, 1902.....	9,110,000
Depletion, 1902 (665,000 acres at 1.54), by 75 per cent.....	770,000
Reconstructed river at Lee Ferry, 1902.....	9,880,000
Maximum consumption, upper basin, 1902 (75 per cent of 6,590,000).....	4,940,000
Available at Lee Ferry, 1902.....	4,940,000

This indicates that under the compact the flow of the lowest year would be available in approximately equal portions for the use of each basin.

Question 7. If a reservoir of 30,000,000 acre-feet capacity had been in existence at that time, how much water would have been carried over from previous years to aid in meeting any deficiency?

Answer 7. Plate XII-A, Senate Document 142, page 30, shows that starting in 1899 with a 26,400,000 acre-foot reservoir half full, the reservoir would have filled in 1900 and again in 1901, and the full demands for irrigating 1,500,000 acres below could have been met not only through 1902 but through the succeeding low years of 1903 and 1904. In addition, sufficient water would have been available for discharge through the months of low irrigation demand to maintain a year around output of 700,000 horsepower.

Question 8. How many acres are now being irrigated; what additional areas can be irrigated from the main Colorado River, and what is the estimated cost of the reclamation of the lands in Arizona within the projects that have been investigated by the Reclamation Service up to the present time?

Answer 8. Senate Document No. 142, gives the following figures for lands irrigated in Arizona, 1920, from the main stream of the Colorado:

Irrigated 1920, Arizona.
	Acres.
Main stream:
Parker project.....	4,000
Yuma project.....	46,000
Total, 1920.....	50,000
Additional irrigable, Arizona.
	Acres.
Main stream:
Cottonwood Island.....	2,000
Parker project.....	106,000
Mojave Valley.....	26,000
Yuma project.....	75,000
Cibola Valley.....	16,000
Isolated tracts.....	4,000
Total additional.....	229,000

Cost data for most of the above projects are not available in sufficient detail to be of value. An engineer of the Indian Service estimated in 1920 a cost of $78 per acre for the Parker project, exclusive of storage, flood control, and power (S. Doc. No. 142, p. 55). Gravity lands on the Yuma project are subject to a construction charge of $75 per acre.

Question 9. I would like to have the same information as to the projects in California on the Colorado River above the Laguna Dam.

Answer 9. Senate Document No. 142 gives the following figures:

	Irrigated, 1920.	New acreage.	Total.
	Acres.	Acres.	Acres.
Mojave Valley.....	1,000	1,000	2,000
Chemehuevi Valley.....	2,300	2,300	4,600
Palo Verde Valley.....	35,000	43,000	78,000
Palo Verde Mesa and Chuckawalla Valley.....	62,000	62,000	124,000
Total.....	35,000	108,300	143,300

Question 10. Is it true that, if the Colorado River compact is adopted, all of the water that Arizona will ever get out of the main river will be enough to irrigate only 280,000 acres of land, of which 130,000 acres are now embraced in the Yuma project and 110,000 acres in the Parker project?

Answer 10. The Colorado River compact does not attempt to divide the water of the river between individual States. Except for rights already initiated by California and Nevada, there is nothing in the compact that will prevent the State of Arizona from taking from the river all the water that it can put to beneficial use. Rights already initiated will have to be respected in any event, and future development under the compact will be undertaken only in competition with the two States named, and with the cooperation instead of against possible opposition of the States of the upper basin. The present and prospective use of water in the lower basin is estimated, as follows:

Use of Colorado River, lower basin.

Lower basin.	Acreage irrigated, 1920.	Consumption of water, acre-feet.	New acreage.	Consumption of water, acre-feet.	Total acreage.	Total consumption of water, acre-feet.
Arizona.....	58,000	290,000	229,000	860,000	287,000	1,150,000
California.....	450,000	2,250,000	490,000	1,540,000	940,000	3,790,000
Nevada.....	5,000	20,000	35,000	140,000	40,000	160,000
Total, Main River.....	513,000	2,560,000	754,000	2,540,000	1,267,000	5,100,000

From this the surplus available for any further development that may be found feasible may be deduced as follows:

	Acre-feet.
Mean annual flow at Lee Ferry after deducting all future uses in the upper basin (see question 5).....	11,510,000
Total visible demands.....	5,100,000
Surplus.....	6,410,000

This would irrigate nearly 2,000,000 acres of land in addition to the acreage figured above, and since water must flow downhill, and since a reservoir at Boulder Canyon of the size proposed will completely control the stream at that point, it only remains to find the land to which this water can be profitably applied.

Question 11. What information have you with respect to the Arizona High Line Canal plan?

Answer 11. We have asked our field engineers for report on Arizona High Line Canal, which has just been received as follows:

"The Arizona High Line Canal as outlined more recently contemplates—

"A storage reservoir at or near Glen Canyon. Its capacity has not been stated in definite terms.

"A second dam at Boulder Canyon to be built to elevation 1,350 feet, or 1,375 feet, or a dam at the lower end of the Grand Canyon of a less height that will raise the water to the same elevation.

"A tunnel from the Detrital Sacramento Wash through the Black Mountains some 15 or 20 miles in length which would come out on the western side of the Black Mountains in the general region of Eldorado Ferry, water to be delivered at the end of the tunnel at an elevation not less than 1,325 feet.

"A large canal, extending southward and generally parallel with the Colorado River, following along the west side of the Black Range, the greater portion of which would be in tunnel from a point back of Eldorado Ferry to Mount Davis. These tunnels may aggregate another 15 miles or more; thence an open canal crossing a detrital wash country with many deep washes southward along the Blue Ridge and Black Mountains, crossing Sacramento Wash and the main line of the Santa Fe Railroad a few miles from Franconia; thence south and southwesterly toward the Colorado River, where it would pass around the west face of the Chemehuevi Mountains and the Williams Mountains; thence easterly along the north side of the Williams River to a crossing on the Williams River. Through this region there would be more or less tunnel work.

"A crossing of the Williams River either by a high dam in that stream where the river is confined in a box canyon, through the Rawhide Mountains, or by a high aqueduct or a large siphon. Some surveys are being conducted at the present time by the Arizona Engineering Commission to ascertain data on this crossing. The canal would then run westerly along the south side of the Williams River through the Buckskin Mountains, tunneling through the Osborne Pass; thence in a general southerly direction through the Cactus Plain to the general region of Bouse.

"The first tracts of tillable land of any consequence encountered would be that lying within what is commonly called the Bouse Valley. The proposed canal line would probably cross the Phoenix branch of the Santa Fe Railroad between Bouse and Vicksburg. What the irrigable area of these valleys amounts to is as yet an undetermined quantity.

"The main canal would continue in a southeasterly direction, passing to the south of the Little Harqua Hala Mountains through a pass that has been estimated to be from 16 to 25 miles in length. This part of the construction would be a deep cut, the depth of the cut depending upon the elevation at which a canal would reach that point. Before reaching this cut the canal would bifurcate, some of the water being taken south and southwesterly to irrigate other possible areas. It is planned that the water would finally reach Centennial Wash. The south and southwesterly branch would pass between the S. H. Mountains and the Little Horn Mountains to the Palomas Plain, from which point it would be on the Gila watershed and would be conveyed to other lands on the Gila.

"These several branches would bifurcate, carrying water to different valleys, some of which contemplate considerable pumping lifts. The acreage under this possible system is impossible to state, as up to the present time it is nothing more than the roughest kind of a guess, and one upon which no figures can be given. There are not sufficient data at hand to make an estimate as to the cost of constructing such a large canal. The Arizona engineering commission is at the present time trying to ascertain the elevation of certain controlling points, and it is hoped that in the near future the commission will be able to give some idea as to the practicability or impracticability of conducting any further investigations as to the merits or demerits of such a scheme."

Question 12. It has been said that the Arizona High Line Canal project is just as feasible as the Columbia River Basin gravity project recently approved by Gen. George W. Goethals. Please compare the main features of these two projects.

Answer 12. As far as this office is advised no surveys or detailed estimates are available from which any statement of the construction quantities or costs involved in the main features of the Arizona High Line Canal can be even approximated. No comparison is therefore now possible.

Question 13. In his report on the Columbia River Basin project, General Goethals discusses a pumping plan which contemplates building a dam 285 feet high across the Columbia River near the head of the Grand Coulee and using the energy thus stored to operate 17 pumps, each with a capacity of 1,000 second-feet, which will raise the water 450 feet to an artificial lake, whence the water flows by gravity to the basin area, where 1,403,000 acres may be irrigated. The total estimated cost of this pumping project is $241,487,285, or $172 per acre, and the annual operating cost is estimated at $1.56 per acre.

It has occurred to me that, as an alternative to the upper and more expensive part of the Arizona High Line Canal plan, consideration might be given to a pumping project, the essential features of which would be as follows:

A. Utilize the power site about 5 miles above Parker, for which application has been made by Beckman and Linden, by constructing a dam about 75 feet high for the generation of hydroelectric energy. If this dam will not provide enough power, after the flow of the Colorado River is regulated, then supplement the same by power developed in the Grand Canyon.

B. Raise the water about 900 feet by pumping from the Colorado River through a conduit or conduits about 15 miles long up the Osborne Wash to the level of the proposed Arizona High Line Canal, from whence it would flow by gravity as proposed in the original scheme.

I shall be pleased to receive your comments on this idea.

Answer 13. As to this, our field engineers report as follows:

"This plan appears infeasible, but as a possibility the Arizona Engineering Commission has considered and is considering the possibility of a diversion at this point to divert water for the lands lying along the Colorado River south of the dam site spoken of above, with the possibility of pumping water therefrom to moderate lifts. From this dam site south to a point about opposite Lighthouse Rock, the topography is such that a canal might be constructed. At or near Lighthouse Rock it might be possible to raise water in the distant future some 100 or 150 feet, passing through the Trigo and Chocolate Mountains, reaching the plain lying east of Castle Dome at an elevation that certain lands lying on the lower Gila might be served. The acreage and the difficulties encountered in this are not definitely known and the whole proposition only stands out as a remote possibility of the development of lands on the extreme lower Gila."

Question 14. While I fully realize that the Colorado River compact makes no reference to the location of storage reservoirs on that stream, yet the subject is of great interest to the people of Arizona. I shall, therefore, appreciate it if you will make a brief comparison of the Bulls Head, Black Canyon, Boulder Canyon, Diamond Creek, and Glen Canyon dam sites.

Question 15. For the same reason, I would like to have a summary of the available information relative to the Sentinel, San Carlos, and Solomonville dam sites on the Gila, and the Horseshoe and Camp Verde dam sites on the Verde River.

Answers 14 and 15. The following table gives the data available in this office relative to these dam sites.

Name.	Storage capacity (acre-feet).	Estimated cost. ¹	Height of dam (feet). ²	Width at base (feet).	Depth to bedrock (feet).	Character of rock in walls.	Horse-power developed.
San Carlos.....	1,600,000	$9,792,763	249	222	20	Quartzite or quartzitic sandstone.	6,500
Horseshoe.....	233,000	1,909,000	166	200	30	*20,000
Camp Verde.....	421,000	1,701,800	210	25	Sandstone.....

² Above low-water level or stream bed.

³ Developed at drop 20 miles below dam.

⁴ Foundation is lava or cemented gravel underlain by sand and silt to a depth of at least 200 feet.

⁵ Assuming equated flow.

⁶ Drilling not completed.

NOTE.—Average annual net evaporation loss measured at Roosevelt is 60 inches, and this figure has been the basis of evaporation estimates for most of the reservoir studies in this region.

Question 16. It has been said that the Colorado floods have never initiated any serious damage to the Yuma project or the Imperial Valley but that the Gila River constitutes the principal menace; that the only method of curbing the Gila is an adequate levee system, which can be constructed in 18 months at one-fifth the cost of the Boulder Canyon Dam. Will expensive levees have to be maintained on both sides of the Colorado River below Yuma after a large flood-control dam has been constructed on the main Colorado River?

Answer 16. A dam at Boulder Canyon will control all the floods on the main river capable of doing any damage at Yuma except those from the Gila, and it is the only reservoir site on the river of sufficient capacity which is below the sources of all these floods. Until the Gila floods are otherwise controlled it will be necessary to maintain levees to prevent damage from the floods on this stream. As is well known, however, floods from the Gila are of flashy character, and while they may be of sufficient magnitude to inflict some damage, they will subside as quickly as they arise and the days and weeks of night-and-day struggle with the river during each recurring Colorado flood will be a thing of the past. Even if a Gila flood should be experienced of sufficient magnitude to break into the Imperial Valley, its quick subsidence would leave the breach practically dry for repair if the water from the main river could be cut off or regulated at Boulder Canyon.

The annually recurring menace to Yuma and the Imperial Valley against which they are without defense at present is that a Gila flood may come down on top of an early Colorado rise or that breaches made by Gila floods may open the way for the summer floods of the Colorado to break into Imperial Valley. The breaks of 1905-6 and the flood of January, 1916, illustrate the possibilities of such a combination.

Question 17. It has been said that if the depth to bedrock for the foundation of the proposed dam at Black Canyon is found to be over 100 feet, as it is reported to be at Boulder Canyon, that it might be more economical to build the Glen Canyon Dam first so as to have the benefit of the regulated flow from the upper reservoir during the construction of the deep and difficult foundations either at Black or Boulder Canyons. What are the results thus far obtained in prospecting for bedrock at these dam sites?

Answer 17. The maximum depth to bedrock at Boulder Canyon Dam site is about 140 feet below low water. Foundation and walls are of granite of excellent quality for a dam foundation. At site of the upstream cofferdam a line of drill holes shows a maximum depth of only 36 feet to bedrock. It is not considered advisable, however, to move the dam itself upstream to this point, as both the condition and the topography of the side walls at this point are much less favorable than at the site under consideration.

The greatest depth to bedrock found so far at Black Canyon is 123 feet. Sufficient borings have not yet been made to develop this site completely, and work is still in progress.

The foundation and walls at Black Canyon are described as a hard volcanic breccia, overlaid by flows of latite and andesite. This formation as exposed in the canyon walls is entirely suitable for the construction of a high masonry dam, and unless future borings disclose unexpectedly inferior material in the foundation or excessive depth to bedrock, the site should be entirely satisfactory for the construction of a high masonry dam.

The rock in the abutments at the Glen Canyon site is a soft reddish sandstone, unsuitable for building stone or for either coarse or fine concrete aggregate, but probably of sufficient strength to support a concrete dam. Foundation conditions have not been fully tested, the single drill hole then being sunk having on December 15, 1922, reached a depth of 60 feet in the fine sand and silt of the river bed, without having reached bedrock. This drill work is being done by the Southern California Edison Co., and we have no later information as to the progress of this drilling.

As to the economy of building Glen Canyon Dam before one at the Boulder or Black Canyon site, attention is called to the fact that Glen Canyon is too far from power markets now available to be of value for power production for many years. For any given capacity up to complete regulation of the stream the height of a dam above low water at Glen Canyon must be greater than one at Boulder Canyon. Taking into consideration the greater distance from sources of supplies and labor, and other unfavorable conditions, a dam at Glen Canyon can not cost less than a dam of equal capacity at Boulder Canyon, and will produce absolutely no direct financial return for many years.

The amount estimated for river control and diversion during construction at Boulder Canyon is $3,500,000. If the Glen Canyon dam cost $50,000,000, as estimated for Boulder Canyon in the table, one year's interest at 6 per cent would practically absorb the savings on the Boulder Canyon dam, and even assuming for the sake of argument that it would cost only $25,000,000, the saving would be swallowed up in two years. Under most favorable conditions power returns could not be realized in any considerable amount at Boulder Canyon in less time than that.

Question 18. The Interior Department appropriation act for the next fiscal year contains an item making $100,000 immediately available for further engineering investigations on the Colorado River by the United States Reclamation Service. Is it your intention to expend any part of this sum in ascertaining the depth to bedrock and in obtaining other information relative to the Glen Canyon dam site?

Answer 18. It had been our intention to undertake the drilling of the Glen Canyon site and push it to a conclusion next winter, beginning as soon as the subsidence of the summer floods would permit. If, however, the work of the Southern California Edison Co., now under way at this site, results in satisfactory development of foundation conditions, it will not be necessary for the Reclamation Service to put in a drill outfit there.

Question 19. Any further comment that you may care to make relative to the approval of the Colorado River compact by the Arizona State Legislature will be appreciated.

Answer 19. The Colorado River compact provides that the lower basin shall be guaranteed an average of 7,500,000 acre-feet of water annually from the upper basin and all of the yield of the lower basin, and that any water not beneficially used for agricultural and domestic uses shall likewise be allowed to run down for use below. This provides for all known uses of water in the lower basin and a very large surplus for such uses as may develop in the future. The greatest merit of the compact from the standpoint of Arizona is that it changes the attitude of the upper States from one of antagonism to one of friendship and advocacy of storage in the lower basin. If this fair offer is now rejected, the opposition of the upper basin to storage for the benefit of the lower basin will have stronger moral ground than ever, and the attitude of antagonism will be accentuated. This would accord with the wishes of those who are opposed to the development of the river and are opposing the compact. Arizona would thereby be placed in a position of preferring contention to development and her interests would suffer accordingly.

REPLIES MADE BY MR. OTTAMAR HAMELE.

Mr. Ottamar Hamel, for a number of years chief counsel of the United States Reclamation Service, acted as Mr. Hoover's legal advisor during the sessions of the Colorado River Commission last November at Santa Fe. I therefore considered him to be the best equipped to give a legal interpretation of the meaning of the compact. His replies to my questions will, I trust, clear up a number of misconceptions about it which are not founded on good law or sound reasoning.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES RECLAMATION SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., January 29, 1923.

HON. CARL HAYDEN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR HAYDEN: I have received the nine questions prepared by you concerning the Colorado River compact and take pleasure in answering them below in the order given:

Question 1. It has been said that the Colorado River compact is based upon the fallacious theory that the seven States named therein are jointly invested with the absolute ownership of that stream, and all rights arising out of or pertaining thereto, and consequently these States have power to divide its waters among themselves; but that as a matter of fact and law any right in and to the waters of the Colorado River can only be acquired by appropriation for a beneficial use, which right may be exercised solely by private citizens and not by any State, and therefore the proposed apportionment of the flow of the stream among the States of the upper and lower divisions can not be enforced because the Federal courts would grant relief to any citizen of the United States injured thereby who has a vested right in the stream, even though such right was initiated and acquired after the approval of the compact by the legislatures of the seven States and by the Congress. What is your answer to this contention?

Answer 1. When the terms of the Colorado River compact shall have been properly and fully approved by a State, they will be a part of the law of that State relating to the use of water, and in so far as they conflict with prior law they will operate as a repeal. Rights vested before such approval of the compact would not be affected by its terms, while rights vested after such approval would be subject to these terms, as is true generally of other State legislation. Every arid State has adopted rules under which the citizen obtains a right to the use of water; to limit future appropriations to the allocated waters of the compact is merely an additional rule.

Question 2. It has been suggested that no such compact between the seven States is necessary as an antecedent to the construction by the Federal Government of reservoirs on the lower Colorado, because Congress, acting for the United States as the owner of the dam and reservoir sites, could provide at the time when funds are made available that the building of such dams for power and irrigation purposes shall not be considered as creating any rights to the use of the waters of the Colorado River which might be adverse to subsequent appropriators in the upper basin. Has Congress now the power to thus limit or modify the right to the use of water from such reservoirs?

Answer 2. There is a diversity of opinion on this point. In the Wyoming-Colorado case the United States took the position that the National Government is the owner of the use of the unappropriated waters of the arid West, and that the States have never acquired any rights therein. However, the court, in deciding the case, did not pass on this claim and the question remains an open one. Under the theory advanced by the Government in that case, the United States apparently would have the right by legislation to place the limitations you mention on the water rights acquired in connection with Government dams and reservoirs.

If, however, it be contended that under existing law the State of Arizona, for instance, has a right as a sovereign to the use of the waters of the Colorado River under the doctrine of prior appropriation without reference to State lines, and that appropriations by the Federal Government in that State must follow State law, it would seem that an act of Congress could not substitute for Government reservoirs in Arizona a new rule of appropriation not in agreement with the law of Arizona.

Question 3. The regulation of the flow of the Colorado River by the construction of large reservoirs would undoubtedly result in making available an increased supply of water at all seasons of the year, and the fear has been expressed that this water might be promptly utilized for the irrigation of large tracts of land in Mexico. Would the prior appropriation of this water to a beneficial use in Mexico create any right which the American Government would be bound to respect in case of a conflict of interests arising out of the subsequent development of irrigation projects within the United States whereby these Mexican lands would be deprived of water?

Answer 3. It would not. The rule of international law applicable to such a case was stated by Attorney General Judson Harmon in an opinion dated December 12, 1895 (21 Op. Atty. Gen. 274), concerning the Rio Grande. The following is taken from the syllabus of the reported opinion of the Attorney General:

"The rules, principles, and precedents of international law impose no duty or obligation upon the United States of denying to its inhabitants the use of the water of that part of the Rio Grande lying entirely within the United States, although such use results in reducing the volume of water in the river below the point where it ceases to be entirely within the United States.

"The fact that there is not enough water in the Rio Grande for the use of the inhabitants of both countries for irrigation purposes does not give Mexico the right to subject the United States to the burden of arresting its development and denying to its inhabitants the use of a provision which nature has supplied, entirely within its own territory. The recognition of such a right is entirely inconsistent with the sovereignty of the United States over its national domain."

Question 4. Would a declaration by Congress or by the legislatures of any of the seven States, made at the time of the approval of the Colorado River compact, of an intention ultimately to use all of the water necessary for the irrigation of any lands which may thereafter be reclaimed within the United States, or within any such States, regardless of any irrigation development that may subsequently take place in Mexico, be effective in preserving the right to use such water in the future?

Answer 4. Such a declaration by a State would be of no force, as the subject matter is one over which the State has no control. Such a declaration by the Congress would suggest a national policy, but would not prevent the making of a treaty having a contrary effect.

Question 5. It has been urged that the State of Arizona should be guaranteed forever the right to the entire and undiminished flow of the Colorado River as it now comes, and for ages past has come, to the north boundary line of that State. Upon what legal theory can the demand for such a right be based, and, in the absence of any guarantee or acknowledgment of its validity by the States of the upper division, how can the State of Arizona now successfully maintain and enforce such a claim?

Answer 5. The proposition you describe seems to be based on the common-law doctrine of riparian rights, which, however, does not obtain in the Colorado River Basin. Such a demand on the part of Arizona could not well be maintained. Other States could make the claim with equal force, to the detriment of Arizona. It would be contrary to the rule of prior appropriation which is the foundation of the present water law of Arizona and of the other States of the arid West. Also, it would be contrary to the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Wyoming-Colorado case.

Question 6. What is the legal meaning of the term "any period of 10 consecutive years reckoned in continuing progressive series" as used in paragraph (d) of Article III of the Colorado River compact? What means could any State of the lower division use to compel the delivery of 75,000,000 acre-feet of water during such a period? Would it be necessary to wait until the end of some 10-year period before invoking the remedy?

Answer 6. The time referred to as "any period of 10 consecutive years reckoned in continuing progressive series" means the period from October 1, 1923, to October 1, 1933, the period from October 1, 1924, to October 1, 1934, and so on. If paragraph (d) of article 3 were being violated, suit could be brought to enforce its provisions. The aggrieved party would not necessarily have to wait until October 1, 1933, before instituting suit, but of course could not bring such suit until it appeared as a fact that the compact was being violated. This paragraph could be eliminated without disturbing the plan of the compact, and should always be read in connection with paragraphs (a) and (b) of the same article.

Question 7. If the States of the upper division should withhold water in violation of paragraph (e) of Article III of the Colorado River compact, what means would any State of the lower division have to compel the actual delivery of all water which was not being reasonably applied to domestic and agricultural uses?

Answer 7. The same means such State now has to enforce its interstate water claims, supplemented, however, with the advantage of having its legal rights much more clearly defined. The plan of the compact is to reduce causes of controversy to a minimum, first, by agreeing upon the respective legal rights, and, second, by developing between the States, under the provisions of Articles V and VI, a spirit of cooperation and better understanding.

Question 8. In the case of Howell v. Johnson (89 Fed. 556), the court held that "being the owner of these (public) lands it (the United States) has power to sell or dispose of any estate therein or any part thereof. The natural unnavigable streams flowing over the public domain are a part thereof, and the National Government can sell or grant the same or the use of the water separate from the rest of the estate under such conditions as may to it seem proper." Congress has passed the desert land act approved March 3, 1877 (19 Stat. 377), which provides that the "sources of water supply upon the public lands and not navigable shall remain and be held free for the appropriation and use of the public for irrigation, mining, and manufacturing purposes." If Article IV of the compact be construed as a declaration that the Colorado River is a non-navigable stream, could it be held that the effect of the approval of the compact by Congress would be to transfer the title to the unappropriated waters of the Colorado River from the United States to the seven States named therein, and also as a repeal of the provision of the desert land act which I have quoted?

Answer 8. Secretary of the Interior Albert B. Fall, who is generally recognized as an authority on relations between this country and Mexico, on January 12, 1923, upon request, made a report on the Colorado River compact to the House Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands. In that report he stated:

"The said paragraph (a), Article IV, of the compact would, in my opinion, be regarded as a violation of the rights of Mexico, and, to say the least, might be made the basis of a claim against the United States. I am clearly of the opinion that said paragraph should not be approved by the Congress of the United States."

However, should Congress consent to the paragraph in question, such consent would not, in my opinion, operate as a transfer to the States of any right the Government now has in the waters of the Colorado or as a repeal of any part of the desert land act. The compact was drafted with the understanding that it should neither affirm nor deny either the claims of the States or the claims of the United States upon this point. The United States has no interest adverse to any State, and the compact is thoroughly workable without settling therein the point you raise.

Question 9. What is your interpretation of the meaning of Article VIII of the compact? Does the use of the term "such rights" imply that "present perfected rights" to the use of water in the lower basin would have to be satisfied from stored water after a storage capacity of 5,000,000 acre-feet has been provided? Whenever a reservoir of that size is available, must all future appropriations of water in the lower basin be based upon stored water and not upon the natural flow of the river?

Answer 9. The purpose of Article VIII is largely psychological. It represents a compromise reached after much discussion. The compact would be complete were it eliminated. As I stated above, vested rights can not be affected by the compact. John Doe can execute a deed purporting to convey the house and lot belonging to his neighbor Richard Roe, but such deed is ineffective as a conveyance until signed by Richard Roe. So with rights from the Colorado River. It is planned that eight parties shall approve the Colorado River compact; such approvals can affect only the interests which those eight parties have, and can not cancel the vested rights of a ninth party not a party to the compact.

In my opinion, in so far as Article VIII can be construed as an attempt to change vested rights, it is ineffective. I believe these general statements answer your first two queries under this number. As to your third query, inasmuch as substantially all of the low water flow of the main Colorado has already been appropriated, "future appropriations" from that stream for the lower basin necessarily must depend largely upon storage. I would add that such appropriations would be based primarily not on storage but on the allocation of 8,500,000 acre-feet of water per annum under paragraphs (a) and (b) of Article VIII.

In conclusion, I would suggest that in considering the Colorado River compact two facts should be kept in mind. The first is that this compact represents a compromise of many conflicting claims, as must nearly always be true in any settlement of this kind, either in or out of court. However, this settlement was reached within a year, while the settlement in court in the Wyoming-Colorado case required about 11 years, and is very unsatisfactory, not to one alone, but to both of the States involved in that case. The second fact to keep in mind is that the compact is not intended to be a complete settlement of all possible water controversy in the Colorado River Basin, but is a big step in the right direction and as big a one as can apparently be made at this time.

Very truly yours,

OTTAMAR HAMELE,
Chief Counsel.

INFORMATION FURNISHED BY THE GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

It has been well said that water is the essence of the compact. The United States Geological Survey has been engaged for many years in the work of measuring the flow of streams, and has the only reliable information on that subject. The following letter fully demonstrates that the water supply, if properly conserved, is ample for all purposes.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Washington, January 30, 1923.

HON. CARL HAYDEN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HAYDEN: In reply to your letters of January 4 and 11, and with reference to frequent personal interviews on the subject, I am sending you herewith answers to the questions propounded relative to the Colorado River.

Yours very cordially,

PHILIP S. SMITH,
Acting Director.

Question 1. According to your records, what is the maximum, minimum, and average annual flow in acre-feet of the Colorado River between Yuma and Lees Ferry? I would also like to have the same information for all of the tributaries of the Colorado River in Arizona where you have a record of stream measurement.

Answer 1. The summary of the principal records available for gauging stations on Colorado River and tributaries in the State of Arizona is shown by the attached blue-print sheets. The data given for each station are: The years or partial years of record, the maximum and minimum daily flow and dates of occurrence for each year, the average discharge for each complete year, and the total run-off for each year or partial year. The year used is the climatic or water year, beginning October 1 and ending September 30, unless otherwise noted.

The longest continuous record is that for Colorado River at Yuma, which begins with January, 1902. This record is collected by the United States Reclamation Service and furnished to the Geological Survey for publication. The point of measurement is below the mouth of the Gila, so the contribution of that stream is included in the record. The amounts diverted at Laguna Dam are not included in the record. The maximum year was 1908-9—run-off, 26,100,000 acre-feet; the minimum year was 1903-4—run-off, 9,870,000 acre-feet. The average annual run-off for 20 years is 17,450,000 acre-feet. It is of interest to note that the run-off during the year ending September 30, 1922, was about 1 per cent greater than the 20-year average.

The only records of flow of the Colorado River above Yuma are for one complete year at Lees Ferry, two complete years at Hardyville, and five complete years at Topock. The run-off at Lees Ferry for that year (1921-22) was 16,100,000 acre-feet. The average of the two years' records at Hardyville (1905-6, 1906-7) was 20,150,000 acre-feet. The records at Yuma show that the flow in these two years was 30 per cent greater than the 20-year average. The average run-off of five years at Topock (1917-1922) was 17,860,000 acre-feet. The records at Yuma show that the flow in the five years was 6 per cent less than the 20-year average. The run-off in 1921-22 at Topock was 6 per cent greater than the five-year average at Topock.

The records indicate that 1921-22 was approximately an average year of run-off. The inflow between Lees Ferry and Topock for that year, as shown by the records, was 2,900,000 acre-feet. There was an apparent loss of 1,400,000 acre-feet between Topock and Yuma, in addition to the total amount of all inflow between the two points. This loss is partially accounted for by diversions for irrigation at Laguna Dam and other points above.

The available records for Little Colorado and Williams Rivers are too short to permit of reliable deductions as to the mean annual flow. The average annual contribution of these streams to the main Colorado has been estimated at 200,000 acre-feet for the Little Colorado and 75,000 acre-feet for Williams River.

Records have been obtained at several points on Gila River for periods of different length. The records for stations at Guthrie, Solomonville, San Carlos, and Kelvin have been assembled in the attached tabulation. Below the junction of the Salt there are records for one year near Sentinel and for three complete years in the vicinity of Dome. Records of several years' duration are available for Salt and Verde Rivers, and for periods of various length for San Francisco River, at Clifton; San Pedro River, near Fairbank; Santa Cruz River, at Tucson; Augua Fria River, near Glendale; and Hassayampa River, near Wagoner.

Inspection of the longer records for Colorado River at Yuma and those for Salt and Verde Rivers shows that during the past 20 years there were two periods or groups of years of high run-off. The first group contains the years 1905 to 1909, and the second group the years 1915 to 1917. It is evident, therefore, that figures representing average annual run-off at points on streams in Arizona, deduced from a record of only a few years in length, may be subject to considerable error.

Question 2. What percentage of the total flow of the Colorado River originates above Lees Ferry, and how much below that point?

Answer 2. Measurements of the flow of Colorado River at Lees Ferry have been made since July, 1921. The total run-off at that station for the water year ending September 30, 1922, was 16,100,000 acre-feet. For the same period the flow at Yuma was 17,600,000 acre-feet, and at Topock, 19,000,000 acre-feet. Therefore, for that year 91.5 per cent of the total flow as measured at Yuma and 84.2 per cent of that measured at Topock came from above Lees Ferry.

The mean annual flow at Yuma for the 20-year period 1903-1922 is 17,400,000 acre-feet. Therefore the water year ending September 30, 1922, was 200,000 acre-feet, or a little more than 1 per cent greater than the mean.

From the above it appears that between 85 and 90 per cent of the total flow of the Colorado River originates above Lees Ferry. Before the Lees Ferry records were available a study was made for the Colorado River Commission of records collected at gauging stations above Lees Ferry and the conclusion reached at that time—March, 1922—that about 91 per cent of the run-off at Yuma came from the States of Wyoming, Colorado, and Utah.

Question 3. What part of the total flow of the Colorado comes from the Gila River?

Answer 3. Records showing the flow of Gila River near the mouth are fragmentary. The Reclamation Service, however, has made an estimate of the total flow for the years 1903 to 1920, based on the available records and measurements of the Gila at or near Yuma. These estimates indicate an annual run-off of the Gila during 1903 to 1920 varying from less than 100,000 to 4,500,000 acre-feet, with a mean of about 1,100,000 acre-feet, which is about 6 per cent of the mean annual flow of the Colorado at Yuma.

Question 4. What are the dates of some of the highest floods in the Colorado River at Yuma and the flow in second-feet at the peak?

Answer 4. The maximum daily flow for each year during the period of record is shown on the attached sheets. The maximum recorded flow at Yuma was on January 22, 1916, when the mean flow for the day was 240,000 second-feet. It should be noted that this flood originated primarily from the Gila, as, during the winter, the main Colorado River is at low stage. The next highest flood occurred June 8, 1920, when the mean daily flow was 190,000 second-feet. This flood came from that part of the drainage area above the Gila. In general, winter floods at Yuma come from the Gila and summer floods from the Colorado River above the Gila.

Question 5. What are some of the low-water dates of the Colorado River at Yuma and the minimum flow in second-feet?

Answer 5. The minimum daily flow for each year of record is shown on the attached sheets. The minimum recorded flow at Yuma occurred January 16, 1919, when the mean flow was 1,800 second-feet.

Question 6. During what periods has all of the flow of the Colorado been diverted into the Imperial Canal, leaving the river dry in Mexico below the intake?

Answer 6. The Reclamation Service has obtained the following information from the Imperial irrigation district:

"In 1915, from September 20 to September 27, and again on October 2 and 3, all the water of the Colorado River was diverted into the Imperial Valley canal system, in spite of which an actual shortage, though not severe nor disastrous, existed there part of that time. In 1919 there was another shortage, the entire flow of the river during the period September 2 to September 14 being diverted into the canal system.

"During this period the mean flow was 3,325 second-feet, the usual diversion at this time of year being 5,000 second-feet. Under date of October 31, 1922, a report in this office shows that the entire flow of the river had again been diverted, the river having been dry below the heading since October 2 and the mean flow for the period October 2-31 was reported at 3,800 second-feet.

"This is the third time, so far as known, that the entire low-water flow of the river has been actually diverted into the valley, but at least one other year of record, 1902, had a minimum and mean flow for the month of September so low that the entire flow would not have satisfied the demands of the lands now under irrigation in Imperial Valley."

Question 7. What are the dates of some of the highest floods of the Gila River at Yuma and the flow in second-feet at the peak?

Answer 7. The Reclamation Service has recorded the following floods on Gila River of over 50,000 second-feet:

Date.	Second-feet.
February, 1891.....	105,000
February, 1905.....	82,000
March, 1905.....	95,000
November, 1905.....	95,000
Feb. 3, 1915.....	80,000
Jan. 22, 1916.....	200,000
Jan. 31, 1916.....	141,000
Nov. 30, 1919.....	72,600
Feb. 25, 1920.....	95,000

Question 8. During what part of the year is there usually no water flowing from the Gila into the Colorado River?

Answer 8. The Reclamation Service has recorded the Gila as having been dry at its mouth during entire months, as follows:

	Years.
May.....	8
June.....	13
July.....	11
August.....	6
September.....	8
October.....	9
November.....	8
December.....	8

Question 9. Have both the Gila and Colorado Rivers been in high flood at the same time?

Answer 9. The records show no periods when both the Colorado and Gila Rivers were in high flood at the same time. During three Gila floods there were considerable flows in the Colorado above the Gila, as follows:

Date.	Yuma Peak.	Colorado.	Gila.
March 20, 1905.....	111,000	16,000	95,000
January 22, 1916.....	240,000	40,000	200,000
April 20, 1917.....	70,000	30,000	40,000

Question 10. When has the Colorado River broken into Imperial Valley, and when were these breaks in the levees closed?

Answer 10. The Colorado has "broken into the Imperial Valley" from August, 1905, to November 4, 1906, and again from December 7, 1906, to February 10, 1907. (These dates have been obtained from papers by C. E. Grunsky, entitled "The lower Colorado River and the Salton Basin," published in Transactions of the American Society of Civil Engineers, vol. 59, pp. 1-50, and by H. T. Cory, entitled "Irrigation and river control in the Colorado River delta," published in Transactions of the American Society of Civil Engineers, vol. 76, pp. 1204-1571.)

Question 11. How many acre-feet of water were poured into the Salton Sink by each of these floods?

Answer 11. There is no exact record of the total flow of water to the Salton Sea during these breaks, but it is approximately the same as the total flow at Yuma for the same periods. The recorded run-off at Yuma during the first period was about 22,000,000 acre-feet and during the second period about 2,500,000 acre-feet.

Question 12. How many acre-feet of silt are deposited in the Colorado River delta each year?

Answer 12. The All-American Canal Board, in report published in 1920 (pp. 24-26), estimates the average quantity of silt carried in suspension annually at Yuma at 90,000 acre-feet and the bed load at 12,000 acre-feet, making a total load of silt of 102,000 acre-feet.

Engineers of the Reclamation Service estimate the average annual quantity of silt carried at Yuma at 113,000 acre-feet (S. Doc. No. 142, 67th Cong., 2d sess., p. 3).

Question 13. What is the estimated number of acre-feet of silt carried by the Colorado River annually at Boulder Canyon and at Lee Ferry?

Answer 13. The Reclamation Service has estimated (S. Doc. No. 142, 67th Cong., 2d sess.) that the amount of silt carried by Colorado River at Boulder Canyon averages about 88,000 acre-feet annually.

Question 14. Do geologists generally agree that the Gulf of California once extended over the Imperial Valley and the Salton Sink?

Answer 14. Geologists generally agree that the Gulf of California once extended over the Imperial Valley and Salton Sink.

Question 15. Arrangements were made last June or July for an engineering commission consisting of Messrs. E. C. LaRue of the Geological Survey, Porter J. Preston of the Reclamation Service, and Homer E. Turner representing the Arizona State water commissioner, to make a reconnaissance of lands irrigable from the Colorado River in western Arizona. How far have the investigations of this commission proceeded, and what results have been obtained up to the present time?

Answer 15. The Arizona engineering commission, consisting of E. C. LaRue, P. J. Preston, and H. E. Turner, is a State commission, for which Mr. LaRue has been lent by the Geological Survey and Mr. Preston by the Reclamation Service. The commission will make its report directly to State officials. There is therefore no report in Washington of findings of the commission to date, and none is expected until the State makes the report public.

DATA FROM THE FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION.

In order to secure late information relating to all the applications for power sites on the Colorado River within the State of Arizona I made inquiry of the Federal Power Commission, and under date of January 2, 1923, received the following data from Col. William Kelly, the chief engineer:

No. 111. Southern California Edison Co., Los Angeles, Calif.: Dam at Grand Wash just west of Nevada-Arizona line, backing water to Diamond Creek.

Dam at Diamond Creek, backing water to west boundary of Park.

Dam at Marble Canyon just above Park, developing head to Lee Ferry.

Dam at Glen Canyon, 500 feet high, backing water approximately to mouth of Green River.

Total development, 2,500,000 horsepower.

No. 258. Southern California Edison Co., Los Angeles, Calif.: Dam at Bulls Head Rock near Fort Mohave, 220 feet high, creating backwater to Old Callville.

Dam at Old Callville, creating backwater to Grand Wash. Capacity of project, 900,000 horsepower.

No. 238. City of Los Angeles, Calif.: Dam at Black Canyon, 500 feet high, developing 600,000 horsepower.

No. 230. James B. Girand, Phoenix, Ariz.: Dam at mouth of Andrus Canyon, about 25 miles above Diamond Creek, developing 65,000 horsepower—alternate scheme to the one of Mr. Girand providing for raising the Diamond Creek Dam.

No. 231. James B. Girand, Phoenix, Ariz.: Dam at Pierce Ferry about 30 miles below Diamond Creek, to create backwater to Diamond Creek and develop about 65,000 horsepower.

No. 30. Beckman & Linden Engineering Corporation, 604 Mission Street, San Francisco, Calif.: Dam above Parker, Ariz., creating backwater to Needles, Calif., and developing 115,000 horsepower.

No. 59. E. I. Beyard, Seligman, Ariz.:

Series of dams from Boulder Canyon to Lee Ferry, developing all the power in the stream except the part within national park.

Applicant has made no showing of preparedness to develop any part of this extension scheme.

No. 265. Guy P. Mohler, box 561, Needles, Calif.:

Project to develop all the power in the Colorado River between Fort Mohave and Boulder Canyon.

Applicant has made no showing of financial ability to carry out his proposed undertaking.

All of the above projects have been advertised in accordance with the provisions of the Federal water power act, but action upon them has been suspended pending the investigations and report of the Colorado River Commission.

No. 121. James B. Girand, Phoenix, Ariz.: Dam at Diamond Creek, 270 feet high, with provision to raise the same to 400 feet, developing 139,000 primary horsepower and with installed capacity of 200,000 horsepower.

A preliminary permit was granted to the Interior Department and by the Forest Service about 1917. An application for a final permit was pending when the Federal water power act was passed, and in accordance with the provisions of section 23 of the act the application was transferred to this commission. The application as prepared did not comply with the regulations of this commission because of the fact that the new act contained many provisions not set forth in the previous act, under which a preliminary permit had been granted. Accordingly this commission gave Mr. Girand a preliminary permit on July 19, 1921, so as to maintain his priority. Pursuant to this preliminary permit, a new application for a license was filed in March, 1922, which was satisfactory from an engineering point of view; but in view of the fact that the Colorado River Commission had been created, and in view of the Swing-Johnson bill providing for the construction of a large dam at Boulder or Black Canyon by the Federal Government, action on Mr. Girand's application was temporarily suspended. Mr. Girand's permit was to have expired July 18, 1922, but it was extended to October 19, 1922, and again extended to March 19, 1923.

APPROVAL OF COMPACT BY CONGRESS.

On December 18, 1922, Hon. FRANK W. MONDELL introduced a bill (H. R. 13480) granting the consent and approval of Congress to the Colorado River compact, a copy of which I shall print as an extension of my remarks. Nothing will be done with that measure until the compact is approved by the legislatures of all of the seven interested States, because Congress can not be expected to act in advance of such an agreement. The bill was referred by the chairman of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands to the State and Interior Departments and to the Federal Power Commission. The following reports have been received:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 30, 1922.

HON. ADDISON T. SMITH,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of December 21, 1922, transmitting a copy of the bill (H. R. 13480) granting the consent and approval of Congress to the Colorado River compact, and requesting me to furnish your committee such information and suggestions as may be proper regarding the proposed legislation.

The compact does not pertain to matters coming within the jurisdiction of this department, except in so far as the control and use of the waters of the Colorado River system may possibly affect the international relations of the Government. The fact that the Colorado River has international aspects and the possibility that questions of an international character concerning the use of the waters may arise, necessitating action by the Federal Government with respect to the distribution of the waters, appears to be recognized and adequately provided for by Article III (c) of the compact.

I may, however, call attention to what appears to be a slight inaccuracy in lines 11 to 14, page 2, of the bill, in which it is stated that the compact was signed by representative commissioners of the States mentioned "and the representative appointed by the President." I think it would be more accurate to state that the compact was signed by the representative commissioners and "approved by the representative appointed by the President." The second paragraph of Article XI, as well as the signatures to the compact (page 11 of the bill) indicate that only the States in question are to be considered signatories.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington.

HON. ADDISON T. SMITH,
Chairman Committee on Irrigation, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SMITH: Answering your request for report upon H. R. 13480, a bill granting the consent and approval of Congress to the Colorado River compact, which measure is designed to ratify a compact executed at Santa Fe on November 24, 1922, by representatives of the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming, and approved by a representative of the United States.

Paragraph (a) of Article IV of the compact would make navigation subservient to domestic, agricultural, and power uses. In this connection, I direct attention to the fact that under the treaty of 1854 the Republic of Mexico appears to have certain rights with reference to the "Rio Colorado." The first paragraph of Article IV of this treaty reads as follows:

"The provisions of the sixth and seventh articles of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo having been rendered nugatory for the most part by the cession of territory granted in the first article of this treaty, the said articles are hereby abrogated and annulled and the provisions as herein expressed substituted therefor. The vessels and citizens of the United States shall in all time have free and uninterrupted passage through the Gulf of California, to and from their possessions situated north of the boundary line of the two countries. It being understood that this passage is to be by navigating the Gulf of California and the River Colorado, and not by land without the express consent of the Mexican Government; and precisely the same provisions, stipulations, and restrictions in all respects are hereby agreed upon and adopted, and shall be scrupulously observed and enforced by the two contracting Governments in reference to the Rio Colorado, so far and for such distance as the middle of that river is made their common boundary line by the first article of this treaty."

The sixth and seventh articles of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, as decreed by this language, were rendered nugatory "for the most part," but you will note the language with reference to the mutuality of rights of the two Governments is expressly insisted upon.

The provisions of this treaty and the articles of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo referred to were considered by the Supreme Court of the United States in what is known as the "Rio Grande Dam case."

During the administration of Mr. Taft a form of convention was presented by this country to Mexico, and was agreed upon for the settlement of the irrigation question and use of water on the lower Colorado.

This convention was never executed nor the commissioners thereunder appointed because of the Mexican revolution, and the matter, as between the United States and Mexico, remains in this shape.

I also direct attention to the decisions of the United States Supreme Court in the case of United States against Rio Grande Irrigation Co. (174 U. S. 69; 184 U. S. 416), in which latter decision the court sets out the treaty provisions, equally applicable to the Rio Colorado, and states—

"These treaties, with the above and other acts of Congress, being in force, the present suit was brought" * * *

And the court concluded by saying—

"We can not resist the conviction that if we proceed to a final decree upon the present record great wrong may be done to the United States, as well as to all interested in preserving the navigability of the Rio Grande. * * * We are the better satisfied with this disposition of the case because the questions presented may involve rights secured by treaties concluded between this country and the Republic of Mexico. As the latter country can not be indifferent to the result of this litigation and is not a party to the record, the court ought not to determine the important question before us in the absence of material evidence, which we are not at liberty upon this record to doubt would be in the record but for the somewhat precipitate action of the trial court."

It will thus be seen that the Supreme Court finally recognized the rights of Mexico under treaty provisions and remanded the case for further evidence, among other reasons, because of the recognition of Mexico's rights.

Thereafter, our Government entered into an arrangement with Mexico for the construction of a reservoir upon the Rio Grande, under the terms of which, among other things, Mexico was granted in perpetuity 60,000 acre-feet of water annually from such reservoir for her use or that of her citizens free of all costs.

On January 8, 1913, a preliminary draft of a proposed convention with Mexico, dealing with the waters of the Colorado, was submitted by the Secretary of State to the then Secretary of the Interior for his consideration and comment. Other preliminary drafts of proposed convention have been submitted by each Government and considerable discussion had taken place, as shown by correspondence on file in this department. The United States insisted upon the appointment of a commission to make studies; the Mexican Government insisted upon the Joint Boundary Commission making such studies. On February 8, 1913, the State Department forwarded a final draft of proposed convention to this department, together with a copy of letter from Secretary Knox to the American ambassador in Mexico. The latter letter advised the ambassador that the department had retained the wording of the preamble as proposed originally and commented on various counterproposals. This proposal was approved by the Interior Department and submitted by Ambassador Wilson to the then Mexican administration. Thereafter, events which took place in Mexico resulted in the recall of the ambassador, leaving the drafts of the convention practically approved by both Governments but without final conclusion, either by treaty or appointment of commissioners.

The matter received consideration during the Wilson administration, various references thereto being made in official correspondence.

In October, 1921, I received from the State Department a communication inclosing translations of communications from the Mexican de facto authorities, referring to meetings of governors of the various States who were discussing rights to the use of waters and requesting that Mexico be allowed to participate in any arrangement concerning the distribution and use of the waters of the Colorado, and that Mexico might be represented as an interested party in any proceedings taken under the act of Congress of August 19, 1921. I replied to this communication and called attention to the fact that on June 27, 1921, I had written the Secretary of State calling his attention to treaty provisions and stating:

"I do not understand that the result of any such consideration (by the commission of which Mr. Hoover is a member) would affect Mexico in any way, as, of course, the United States would not be a party to any agreement with individual or collective States which would constitute a breach or violation of any treaty which it may have entered into with Mexico."

At a meeting in San Diego, Calif., about December 1, 1921, where discussion was had as to report which I was preparing to send to Congress with respect to the use of the waters of the Colorado River, Mexican officials were unofficially present and their informal suggestions listened to. I explained publicly that I favored the construction of a reservoir by the Government for the impounding of waters for the protection of the lower Colorado River for irrigation of present irrigable lands of the United States and Mexico and that I did not favor the granting of any individual rights for power or otherwise until this Government could decide its course of action, for the reason, among others, that the Government was the only authority or power through which the treaty rights of Mexico as well as the rights of the several States of the Union could properly be protected.

The said paragraph (a), Article IV, of the compact would, in my opinion, be regarded as a violation of the rights of Mexico and, to say the least, might be made the basis of a claim against the United States. I am clearly of the opinion that said paragraph should not be approved by the Congress of the United States.

Section 2 of the bill apparently covers the same subject matter as Article X of the compact and appears to be surplusage.

With respect to existing rights to the use of the waters of the Colorado River, treated in Article VIII of the compact, I direct attention to the fact that the United States Government has constructed or is constructing several reclamation projects upon the Colorado River and its tributaries and investigations have been made of other projects which may at some future time be undertaken. I also direct attention to the existing system which irrigates the lands in Imperial Valley, Calif., in the United States, as well as certain lands in Mexico, the main canal passing through Mexico for a long distance prior to entering the irrigable lands of Imperial Valley. With respect to the history of this project, reference is made to volume 33, Land Decisions, page 391, and to pages 14, 15, and 16 of Senate Document No. 103, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, copy inclosed.

In view of the foregoing, I suggest that there be substituted for the present section 2 of the bill the following:

"Sec. 2. That this act is not intended and shall not be construed as an approval by the United States of the provisions of paragraph (a) of article 4 of the compact, nor as abrogating, limiting, or in any way affecting any existing rights of the United States or of the Republic of Mexico concerning the subject matter of the compact."

It would be appropriate in section 1, line 3, after the word "that," to insert the words "subject to the provisions of section 2 of this act"; in section 1, line 11, to change the word "signed" to "executed," and in section 1, line 14, after the word "and," to insert the words "approved by."

Subject to the suggestions above made I favor the enactment of the measure.

Respectfully,

ALBERT B. FALL, Secretary.

FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION,
Washington, December 29, 1922.

[Secretary of War, chairman; Secretary of the Interior; Secretary of Agriculture; O. C. Merrill, executive secretary.]

HON. ADDISON T. SMITH,

*Chairman Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands,
House of Representatives.*

DEAR MR. SMITH: In reply to your request for information and suggestions on H. R. 13480, granting the consent and approval of Congress to the Colorado River compact, I have to inform you that practically all development on the Colorado River is suspended pending the acceptance by the interested States and the United States of some compact to apportion the waters equitably among the States.

There are several developments now under consideration which have merit and a fair chance of success, and in the interest of that region they should be permitted to proceed.

The compact quoted in H. R. 13480 is the result of many conferences and discussions; it has been agreed to by the representatives of all the interested States and offers the best, if not the only, chance of terminating an obstructive controversy. It is believed therefore that H. R. 13480 should receive favorable action.

Very truly yours,

JOHN W. WEEKS,
Secretary of War, Chairman.

It will be noted that the Secretary of State approves of the compact. The Secretary of the Interior also favors its approval by Congress except that, in his opinion, Congress should not agree to paragraph (a) of Article IV, which makes navigation subservient to domestic, agricultural, and power uses. His objection is based upon the fear that to do so might violate the terms of existing treaties with Mexico. This advice by Secretary Fall is gratuitous, since the Department of the Interior has no jurisdiction over the question of the navigability of streams within the United States, which is a function of the War Department, and the conduct of all foreign relations is vested by law in the Department of State. This suggestion may therefore be considered as merely an expression of his personal views which, however, should be given attention as coming from a distinguished international lawyer who has made a profound study of Mexican affairs.

Since the Secretary of the Interior has made these observations upon a matter over which he has no official authority I feel even more free to say that I do not agree with him at all. First, because, in truth, navigation is now, and for many years has been, the least of all the uses of the waters of the Colorado River and there is no way in which Mexico can suffer any injury by a frank recognition of that fact.

Second, because the provisions of the treaties quoted and referred to by Secretary Fall do nothing more than prohibit action by either the Government of the United States or the Government of Mexico along the common boundary line which might impede navigation in the Colorado River. Therefore, anything done wholly within the United States and not along the common boundary line would not violate either the letter or the spirit of these treaties even though navigation were made impossible.

Third, because the general proposition that Mexico has any interest in maintaining the navigability of that part of the Colorado River which is wholly within the United States is completely refuted by the opinion of Attorney General Judson Harmon, dated December 12, 1895, a part of which has been quoted by Mr. Hamel in answer to one of my questions. I am advised that this opinion has always been considered by the State Department to be a sound and accurate statement of the international law governing such cases.

The decision of the Supreme Court in the case of United States v. Rio Grande Irrigation Co. in no way modified or disturbed the legal principles thus laid down by Attorney General Harmon.

The references made by Secretary Fall to the various ineffectual efforts that have been made to conclude a convention between the United States and Mexico dealing with the waters of the Colorado River have absolutely no bearing on the question of navigation. An examination of the terms of these proposed conventions will disclose that nothing was provided except that a joint commission be appointed to study, agree upon, and report the basis of distribution and appropriation of the waters of the Colorado River, the findings of the commission, if and when approved by the two Governments, to be embodied in a treaty.

The report of the Secretary of War, as chairman of the Federal Power Commission, also approves of the compact. His statement that practically all water-power development on the Colorado River is suspended pending the acceptance by the interested States of some such compact confirms what I understand to be a fixed policy of the Harding administration. I am informed that it has been agreed that no applications for power sites on the Colorado River will be granted until the Colorado River compact is approved by the legislatures of the seven States and by Congress. This includes the application of Mr. James B. Grand for the Diamond Creek site in Arizona.

THE MONDELL BILL.

The following is a copy of H. R. 13480, which contains the text of the Colorado River compact:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
December 18, 1922.

Mr. MONDELL introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands and ordered to be printed.

A bill (H. R. 13480) granting the consent and approval of Congress to the Colorado River compact.

Whereas the act approved August 19, 1921, entitled "An act to permit a compact or agreement between the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming respecting the disposition and apportionment of the waters of the Colorado River, and for other purposes," gave the consent of Congress to the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming to negotiate and enter into a compact or agreement providing for an equitable distribution and apportionment among the said States of the waters of the Colorado River and of streams tributary thereto, upon condition that a suitable person, to be appointed by the President of the United States, should participate in said negotiations; and

Whereas under the authority of said act the representative commissioners of the said States did on the 24th day of November, 1922, at the city of Santa Fe, N. Mex., sign a compact under the provisions of the said act, which compact was approved by the representative appointed by the President of the United States: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent and approval of Congress is hereby given to a compact signed at the city of Santa Fe, N. Mex., on the 24th day of November, 1922, under and in accordance with the authority of the act approved August 19, 1921, entitled "An act to permit a compact or agreement between the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming respecting the disposition and apportionment of the waters of the Colorado River, and for other purposes," which compact was signed by the representative commissioners of the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming and the representative appointed by the President of the United States under said act, which compact is as follows:

"COLORADO RIVER COMPACT.

"The States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming, having resolved to enter into a compact under the act of the Congress of the United States of America approved August 19, 1921 (42 Stat. L. 171), and the acts of the legislatures of the said States, have, through their governors, appointed as their commissioners:

"W. S. Norviel, for the State of Arizona;

"W. F. McCure, for the State of California;

"Delph E. Carpenter, for the State of Colorado;

"J. G. Scrugham, for the State of Nevada;

"Stephen B. Davis, Jr., for the State of New Mexico;

"R. E. Caldwell, for the State of Utah;

"Frank C. Emerson, for the State of Wyoming; who, after negotiations participated in by Herbert Hoover, appointed by the President as the representative of the United States of America, have agreed upon the following articles:

"ARTICLE I. The major purposes of this compact are to provide for the equitable division and apportionment of the use of the waters of the Colorado River system; to establish the relative importance of different beneficial uses of water; to promote interstate comity; to remove causes of present and future controversies; and to secure the expeditious agricultural and industrial development of the Colorado River Basin, the storage of its waters, and the protection of life and property from floods. To these ends the Colorado River Basin is divided into two basins, and an apportionment of the use of part of the water of the Colorado River system is made to each of them with the provision that further equitable apportionments may be made.

"ART. II. As used in this compact—

"(a) The term "Colorado River system" means that portion of the Colorado River and its tributaries within the United States of America.

"(b) The term "Colorado River Basin" means all of the drainage area of the Colorado River system and all other territory within the United States of America to which the waters of the Colorado River system shall be beneficially applied.

"(c) The term "States of the upper division" means the States of Colorado, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming.

"(d) The term "States of the lower division" means the States of Arizona, California, and Nevada.

"(e) The term "Lee Ferry" means a point in the main stream of the Colorado River, 1 mile below the mouth of the Paria River.

"(f) The term "upper basin" means those parts of the States of Arizona, Colorado, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming within and from which waters naturally drain into the Colorado River system above Lee Ferry, and also all parts of said States located without the drainage area of the Colorado River system which are now or shall hereafter be beneficially served by waters diverted from the system above Lee Ferry.

"(g) The term "lower basin" means those parts of the States of Arizona, California, Nevada, New Mexico, and Utah within and from which waters naturally drain into the Colorado River system below Lee Ferry, and also all parts of said States located without the drainage area of the Colorado River system which are now or shall hereafter be beneficially served by waters diverted from the system below Lee Ferry.

"(h) The term "domestic use" shall include the use of water for household, stock, municipal, mining, milling, industrial, and other like purposes, but shall exclude the generation of electrical power.

"ART. III. (a) There is hereby apportioned from the Colorado River system in perpetuity to the upper basin and to the lower basin, respectively, the exclusive beneficial consumptive use of 7,500,000 acre-feet of water per annum, which shall include all water necessary for the supply of any rights which may now exist.

"(b) In addition to the apportionment in paragraph (a), the lower basin is hereby given the right to increase its beneficial consumptive use of such waters by 1,000,000 acre-feet per annum.

"(c) If, as a matter of international comity, the United States of America shall hereafter recognize in the United States of Mexico any right to the use of any waters of the Colorado River system, such waters shall be supplied first from the waters which are surplus over and above the aggregate of the quantities specified in paragraphs (a) and (b); and if such surplus shall prove insufficient for this purpose, then the burden of such deficiency shall be equally borne by the upper basin and the lower basin, and whenever necessary the States of the upper division shall deliver at Lee Ferry water to supply one-half of the deficiency so recognized in addition to that provided in paragraph (d).

"(d) The States of the upper division will not cause the flow of the river at Lee Ferry to be depleted below an aggregate of 75,000,000 acre-feet for any period of 10 consecutive years reckoned in continuing progressive series beginning with the 1st day of October next succeeding the ratification of this compact.

"(e) The States of the upper division shall not withhold water, and the States of the lower division shall not require the delivery of water, which can not reasonably be applied to domestic and agricultural uses.

"(f) Further equitable apportionment of the beneficial uses of the waters of the Colorado River system unapportioned by paragraphs (a), (b), and (c) may be made in the manner provided in paragraph (g) at any time after October 1, 1963, if and when either basin shall have reached its total beneficial consumptive use as set out in paragraphs (a) and (b).

"(g) In the event of a desire for a further apportionment as provided in paragraph (f) any two signatory States, acting through their governors, may give joint notice of such desire to the governors of the other signatory States and to the President of the United States of America, and it shall be the duty of the governors of the signatory States and of the President of the United States of America forthwith to appoint representatives, whose duty it shall be to divide and apportion equitably between the upper basin and lower basin the beneficial use of the unapportioned water of the Colorado River system as mentioned in paragraph (f), subject to the legislative ratification of the signatory States and the Congress of the United States of America.

"ART. IV. (a) Inasmuch as the Colorado River has ceased to be navigable for commerce and the reservation of its waters for navigation would seriously limit the development of its basin, the use of its waters for purposes of navigation shall be subservient to the uses of such waters for domestic, agricultural, and power purposes. If the Congress shall not consent to this paragraph, the other provisions of this compact shall nevertheless remain binding.

"(b) Subject to the provisions of this compact, water of the Colorado River system may be impounded and used for the generation of electrical power, but such impounding and use shall be subservient to the use and consumption of such water for agricultural and domestic purposes and shall not interfere with or prevent use for such dominant purposes.

"(c) The provisions of this article shall not apply to or interfere with the regulation and control by any State within its boundaries of the appropriation, use, and distribution of water.

"ART. V. The chief official of each signatory State charged with the administration of water rights, together with the Director of the United States Reclamation Service and the Director of the United States Geological Survey, shall cooperate, ex officio:

"(a) To promote the systematic determination and coordination of the facts as to flow, appropriation, consumption, and use of water in the Colorado River Basin, and the interchange of available information in such matters.

"(b) To secure the ascertainment and publication of the annual flow of the Colorado River at Lee Ferry.

"(c) To perform such other duties as may be assigned by mutual consent of the signatories from time to time.

"ART. VI. Should any claim or controversy arise between any two or more of the signatory States: (a) With respect to the waters of the Colorado River system not covered by the terms of this compact; (b) over the meaning or performance of any of the terms of this compact; (c) as to the allocation of the burdens incident to the performance of any article of this compact or the delivery of waters as herein provided; (d) as to the construction or operation of works within the Colorado River Basin to be situated in two or more States, or to be constructed in one State for the benefit of another State; or (e) as to the diversion of water in one State for the benefit of another State; the governors of the States affected, upon the request of one of them, shall forthwith appoint commissioners with power to consider and adjust such claim or controversy, subject to ratification by the legislatures of the States so affected.

"Nothing herein contained shall prevent the adjustment of any such claim or controversy by any present method or by direct future legislative action of the interested States.

"ART. VII. Nothing in this compact shall be construed as affecting the obligations of the United States of America to Indian tribes.

"ART. VIII. Present perfected rights to the beneficial use of waters of the Colorado River system are unimpaired by this compact. Whenever storage capacity of 5,000,000 acre-feet shall have been provided on the main Colorado River within or for the benefit of the lower basin, then claims of such rights, if any, by appropriators or users of water in the lower basin against appropriators or users of water in the upper basin shall attach to and be satisfied from water that may be stored not in conflict with Article III.

"All other rights to beneficial use of waters of the Colorado River system shall be satisfied solely from the water apportioned to that basin in which they are situate.

"ART. IX. Nothing in this compact shall be construed to limit or prevent any State from instituting or maintaining any action or proceeding, legal or equitable, for the protection of any right under this compact or the enforcement of any of its provisions.

"ART. X. This compact may be terminated at any time by the unanimous agreement of the signatory States. In the event of such termination all rights established under it shall continue unimpaired.

"ART. XI. This compact shall become binding and obligatory when it shall have been approved by the legislatures of each of the signatory States and by the Congress of the United States. Notice of approval by the legislatures shall be given by the governor of each signatory State to the governors of the other signatory States and to the President of the United States, and the President of the United States is requested to give notice to the governors of the signatory States of approval by the Congress of the United States.

"In witness whereof the commissioners have signed this compact in a single original, which shall be deposited in the archives of the Department of State of the United States of America, and of which a duly certified copy shall be forwarded to the governor of each of the signatory States.

"HERBERT HOOVER."

SEC. 2. That the said compact shall not be binding and obligatory on any of the parties thereto unless and until the same shall have been approved by the legislature of each of the said States and proclamation thereof shall be made by the President upon receipt by him from the governors of all the signatory States of notice of approval of such compact by the legislatures thereof.

DEDICATION, ENDICOTT-JOHNSON STADIUM, BINGHAMTON, N. Y.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting in 8-point type a copy of my speech at the dedication of the First Ward Endicott-Johnson Stadium at Binghamton, N. Y., together with the statement of the labor policy of the Endicott-Johnson Corporation.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not necessary that gentlemen request that their remarks be printed in 8-point type. If they are the gentleman's own remarks they will be printed in 8-point type.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the speech and statement referred to:

SPEECH AT DEDICATION FIRST WARD ENDICOTT-JOHNSON STADIUM, BINGHAMTON, N. Y.

"Fellow members of the First Ward Endicott-Johnson Athletic Association, I was glad to become a member of this athletic association about a year ago, and I am doubly glad and proud to claim membership now when I see this wonderful athletic field and stadium so full of possibilities that you have built.

"Helpfulness is the final test of the success or failure of the man, of our institutions, our Government; yes, civilization itself.

"On every hand we find mute monuments that bear their silent but certain message that noble men and heroic women have contributed their time and means and selves in order to be helpful, to lighten the loads of others less fortunate, to make easier the way, to render opportunity more accessible to all.

"Our schools, our hospitals, our churches; yes, our Government itself, all bear the indelible imprint of hearts and minds—yes; lives—dedicated to helpfulness, not alone to the children of this day but to all of the children of all the to-morrows.

"Tom Brown doffed his cap as he stood at the grave of his beloved teacher, Doctor Arnold, of Rugby. A flood of memories of school days came rushing back and of how his dear old beloved teacher had put of himself in his effort to help his boys.

"Sir Christopher Wrenn was the architect of St. Paul's Cathedral in London; he put of himself in his work, and how fitting the epitaph you find over the entrance of his masterpiece, 'If you seek his monument look about you.'

"So, too, this wonderful stadium is an enduring monument, first, to those dauntless pioneers who conceived and dared to undertake; to those who persisted amidst a multitude of discouragements; to the Ansco Co. for its unselfish contributions; to Frank Walters and Roy Barnes for willingly and cheerfully assisting in directing the efforts of a multitude of earnest, enthusiastic souls; but most of all to your Mr. George F. Johnson, a kindred soul with a kindly heart, who understood the yearnings of these young people.

"Christened in the laboratory of honest toil.

"Tried and not found wanting in the crucible of competition.

"No helpful effort in this community seems to escape your observation or fails to enlist your hearty and thoughtful cooperation.

"Helpfulness is your watchword, as it should be ours.

"There flies Old Glory, our flag. Not a star or bar but what speaks its message of inspiration to all the world. On the crumbling ruins of many fallen kingdoms are new governments springing up largely modeled on our own. And everywhere these governments promise a larger helpfulness to all the people.

"No government since the beginning of history has brought so much to so many of its people as our own, and yet strange preachers and teachers are in our midst urging changes in its form and preaching doctrines and inculcating hate. Let us look back on our national history of helpfulness and service to our own; on the inspiration we have been to all the world—and then bid these strange preachers a speedy return to the foreign shores from whence most of them came. Our Constitution guarantees to everyone those inalienable rights of life, of liberty, of property, of equality of opportunity. No more should free men ask, no less do they deserve. Let's keep the faith with the founders who conceived and with a myriad of self-sacrificing souls that 'carried on' this form of government.

"Fly on Old Glory, and may your sons and daughters on this glorious field contest, always honorably and fairly, for all you symbolize; fight as in honor bound for that noble example of the 'square deal,' George F. He has made this field possible to you, and on it you should train yourself in that mastery of self that means so much. Fit your bodies that they may be fit places for all that is best in education and morals, and thus fitted you are prepared for the battle of life.

"The final measure of your success will find itself measured by the principle of the 'square deal' and your helpfulness to your fellow men, and the shining example in all his dealings with his thousands of employees who love him, and of the citizens of the 'valley of opportunity,' everybody's friend, George F. Johnson."

A REPLY AS TO THE ALLEGED "RAPACITY" OF THIS CORPORATION, APPEARING IN THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD OF FEBRUARY 9, 1922. LABOR POLICY OF ENDICOTT-JOHNSON AND WORKERS.

"This article is written in response to persistent requests by labor employers and working people, who wish to know what is the 'policy' which has determined our successful operation of industry, as it is exemplified in the Endicott-Johnson organization. (Written by one who knows.) It needs must be simple, straight to the point, and easily understood.

"First. Wages or salary—or, better yet, yearly income—of the toilers is the outstanding and all-important element, necessarily first in importance. As every man who labors reckons his yearly income, so should a man who makes shoes, because it is his yearly income that determines his circumstances, comfortable or otherwise, under which he needs must exist. We are prone to speak of professional men as 'salaried' workers. Their income is generally spoken of, 'so much a year.' A workingman who labors with his hands is sometimes spoken of so carefully as to mention that he earns 'so much an hour,' or possibly 'so much a day,' and, on rare occasions, 'so much a week.' We think if a workingman earns 'a dollar an hour' it looks pretty big. If he earns '$7 a day' he does pretty fair. And, perchance, if he earns '$35 to $50 a week,' it is great. But he does not live by the hour or by the day or by the week. This is not the way he supports his family and meets his current expenses. So the yearly income is the only way to reckon the income of those who labor with their heads and hands, as we have always figured the income of those who labor chiefly with their heads.

"This gives us the right start. Now, to make a good yearly income for the average working man or woman they must needs have steady work, as near 52 weeks each year as possible, less vacation periods, which are just as necessary for the worker as they are for the professional man. Therefore Endicott-Johnson's first and foremost duty, as they understand it, is to find a way to run steadily, week in and week out, month in and month out, guaranteeing steady incomes to the army of workers under their direction. There must be, first, then, a need for our products. There must be a market. And so, because we manufacture shoes, which are a prime necessity of the people, we are fortunate in the character of our product, shoes, or leather and shoes.

"Shoes are a highly competitive product. There are no 'combinations' in the shoe business. There never has been. There must be keen competition, because the productive capacity is at least one-third greater than the consumption or requirements. So it is a fight for business, which precludes any possibility of operating at big profits with little effort.

"The way we accomplished the elimination of the 'middleman' from our source of supplies is interesting, but this is another story. Sufficient to say that we did eliminate all the 'middlemen' between the raw hide and the finished shoe. Buying hides in the world's markets and manufacturing our own leather in our own tanneries, supplying all our requirements for raw material without the intervention of 'middlemen' or middle costs and profits—this gives us our big source of leather supplies without unnecessary costs. We can make better leather for less money than any tannery in the world. We know how leather should be made, and what is required of leather for manufacturing into shoes. This big advantage makes it possible for us to furnish greater values in shoes, to pay higher wages to labor, to secure steadier production and better income for the entire organization.

"We have higher efficiency in the manufacture of leather and shoes because of square dealing with the workers and because of satisfied and contented workers. We have created in the minds of the average man and woman a real desire and a firm determination to try to do their work better, and do more of it. This has been done because we want them to earn better wages, and they are anxious also to earn good wages. There is not any combination to restrain production. There is no 'teamwork' which would seek to keep down the efforts of good, smart workers. There is no disposition to hold back and not to do a full day's work. And so the smart, intelligent worker earns more than the slower, duller one, as he naturally should. The natural result of this is the slow, dull worker is trying hard to produce quantity and quality to compare with his coworker who is able to do more and better work. So the tendency is always upward and not downward. Poor men do not drag down good men in this industry. Quite the reverse. Good men lift up the poor men. Good workers are an incentive to poor workers. Always there is the uplift.

"The hours of labor are reasonable—48 hours a week. The average wages last year were about $1,450. Under a profit-sharing or surplus-sharing plan there was added to each worker's wages, on the average, about $150, making a yearly income of $1,600—man and woman, every name on the pay roll—52 weeks in the year.

"N. B.—We figure our average wages, including men and women and young people above the legal age of 16 years. We do not hire children below 16, adhering strictly to the legal limit. Many concerns employ young children because they can work cheap, and compute their average wages separately as between men and women, always showing a low average wage paid women and endeavoring to build up a high average wage paid men. This concern is different. We believe women must live as well as men. So we reckon our average wage all together—as last year, $1,600—men and women, young and old.

"This is a high average for the shoe and leather industry, which is generally regarded as very uncertain and in which a large number of women are employed, particularly in the shoe-making end of it.

"We are building homes for the workers as fast as possible. We are selling them at cost or less.

"We are creating low living costs in many ways. We have medical departments, where the workers and all their families may have the best and most scientific care and attention. We have maternity wards and hospital service.

"We have prevention departments, preventing accidents.

"We have playgrounds of every description and swimming pools. We have race tracks. We have entertainments of various kinds. We make life worth living.

"The executives of the company, with one or two exceptions, live with the business and with the people. There is no distinction between those who labor and those who direct that labor. We have all learned to love the business from which we draw our common support.

"We make better shoes and sell them for less money. We are as careful to guard the interests of our customers as we are our own interests. We believe there can be no permanent success except that which is built up by cooperation. We could not expect to make poor shoes and sell them for big money in order to do all the nice things among ourselves that we are doing. We don't want to make a big profit at the expense of the customers. Quite the contrary. We are ambitious to give them more leather and better shoes for less money. While we take good care of ourselves, we also take good care of our customers.

"Every need of every family is promptly cared for. We have old-age pensions, which is simply the weekly wages continued while there is need. We have death insurance, which means we provide the means occasioned by the loss of the heads of families or supporting member of the family. There is no mechanical operation of insurance to deceased workers that gives $1,000 to the family that has lost its support, whether the family needs it or not, or whether they need five times as much. We don't believe in that kind of insurance. Here is the way we insure:

"John, the head of the family, passes away. Immediately the needs of that family, occasioned by John's death, are ascertained, and whatever needs there are are provided for. For instance, John earned $1,600 last year; but, because he made his investment in a big family, he has not been able to save much. He has been hoping, when the children grew up, to save some money, but he has not arrived yet. Therefore, what John's family needs is John's envelope just as if he were living, and this is just exactly what they get. For one year, therefore, John's wages are given to his family just as if he were living. If by that time there has been no adjustment, if the family needs the wages another year, it is provided. It may indeed be provided for the third, fourth, and fifth year. Whatever the needs may be, they are cared for. If John should have had a family, many able to work, if he should, indeed, have had some life insurance, if there is no need occasioned by his death, then nothing is done. So there is no mechanical operation insurance in our business. The needs of every case are carefully considered and conscientiously met. This is the right kind of insurance. Those who need it receive it. Those who don't need it help to pay it. If John's family, who secure his income for the first year, have partly adjusted their affairs, there is a decrease in the amount paid the second year. Or, perhaps, at the end of the second year there is no further need. If there still exists need, whatever that need is is cared for.

"Old-age pensions: If John is a faithful worker and unable to do a full day's work, he is encouraged to do what work he can, and gradually, as he grows older and less able, he finally retires, just as a business man retires, exactly. But his needs are cared for as long as he lives. There is no fixed or stated sum. It is whatever he and his family need to be comfortable with. This is provided as long as he lives, or as long as there is need. And so, to sum up, the needs of the workers are carefully considered and conscientiously supplied.

"Last, but not least, the personal contact and old-fashioned ideas prevail. Human nature is what we reckon with. We know what we like and what we dislike. Therefore we know what the working people like and what they cordially detest. They don't want to be patronized. They don't want to be toadied to. They don't want to accept favors. They only want a 'square deal.' Given it, the 'labor problem' is solved.

"If there is any complaint, they know exactly where to go to 'talk things over.' There are no shop committees, but committees can be made up from the workers, and they can see the head of the business—provided other sources have failed—and they can discuss their troubles freely, frankly, and candidly. There is an honest effort sure to be made to adjust their difficulties.

"The surplus or profit sharing, we believe, is the greatest stabilizer in industry. After good wages have been paid and fair and decent consideration given to the welfare of the producers—after capital has had fair rates of interest; after the customers and buyers of the product have had a 'square deal' in good values and reasonable prices—if there is then any surplus, it is split '50-50' between the common stockholders, who have taken the financial risks, and the workers, who have produced the results. There are no big profits, therefore, split among a few people. There are no families who divide the earnings.

"Everything is 'on the level.' Everything is fair and square. The industry itself is greater than any individual. It is a great place for a man to work. It is a splendid place to bring up a family. It is a business that all have learned to love, because it represents the 'golden rule' and the 'square deal' in industry. It is a successful business which deserves to be successful."

NO QUORUM—CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House. A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in the absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and ninety-five Members are present—a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The doors were opened.

ELECTRICAL SYSTEM OF VOTING.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has been requested to state, and thinks it may be interesting to the Members to know, that in the Committee on Accounts the new electrical system of voting will be on exhibition for a few days, where Members desiring to see it can do so. It is in the Committee on Accounts.

SUGARS IMPORTED FROM ARGENTINA.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged report. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution No. 498 (Rept. No. 1476).

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate Joint Resolution No. 12; that there shall be not to exceed one hour additional general debate on said resolution, one-half of the time to be controlled by those favoring the resolution and one-half by those opposing it. Upon the conclusion of such general debate the resolution shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule, whereupon the resolution with amendments, if any, shall be reported back to the House, the previous question shall be considered as ordered on said resolution and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

That immediately upon the conclusion of the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution No. 12 in the House, the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution No. 79; there shall be not to exceed one hour and thirty minutes general debate on said resolution, one-half of the time to be controlled by those favoring the resolution and one-half by those opposing it; that at the conclusion of the general debate the resolution shall be read for amendments under the five-minute rule, whereupon the resolution with amendments, if any, shall be reported back to the House, the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have that time yielded to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman may use the time as he desires.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it is not my purpose to discuss the rule, but to discuss Senate Joint Resolution 12, which the rule seeks to bring up for further consideration in the House. This resolution, as you may remember, has passed the Senate twice and has already been up for consideration in the House in this Congress.

The claim of the American Trading Co. and of B. H. Howell, Son & Co. has been approved as to its merits by the Secretary of State of this administration, by the Secretary of State of the last administration, by the Attorney General of this administration, and also by the Attorney General of the last administration, and also by the Sugar Equalization Board. Of course, that raises a reasonable presumption in its favor, because these gentlemen have all examined it carefully and have made reports to committees of Congress upon it. I happen to know some of the gentlemen who are the officers of the American Trading Co. Mr. Jennings, the president of the company, was in Yale College when I was a student there, and I knew him very well. Mr. Warren, the first vice president of the company, is a resident of my district, and I know him very well. I want to say of my own personal knowledge that these officers of the company, and, I believe, all the officers of the company, are men of the highest character and standing, who would not be guilty of imposing upon the Congress of the United States or upon the Government of the United States in any possible way to their own financial benefit.

Now, the loss sustained by the American Trading Co. and by B. H. Howell, Son & Co., which worked in conjunction with the American Trading Co., was not in any way the fault of either of those companies. The loss was caused solely and wholly by the action or omission of the United States Government itself. This loss could have been avoided. The fact that it was not avoided was entirely the fault of the Government of the United States. The American Trading Co. knew that there was an embargo in Argentina against the exportation of sugar, and before they agreed to negotiate this transaction for the Government of the United States they obtained from our Secretary of State a promise to have the embargo lifted. They knew they could not export a pound of sugar unless the embargo was lifted as to them, and the Government of the United States, after diplomatic exchanges with Argentina, assured these people that the embargo would be lifted. Well, the embargo was not raised until a period many weeks after all purchases of sugar had been concluded and when it was no longer possible for the American Trading Co. to sell in the United States the sugar which they bought in Argentina without selling it at a very great loss.

The second point is this: The Department of Justice gave out an interview, after the American Trading Co. had made heavy purchases of sugar in Argentina, and before they had sold a pound, before the embargo had been raised, before they could sell a pound, which interview was published throughout the land in the newspapers, stating that the Government was purchasing sugar heavily in Argentina for the purpose of breaking the price in the United States. Of course, as soon as that information was given out to the people through the public press, it did break the price, and the price began to go down just as soon as that information was published, and continued to go down until the price in the United States was very low.

There was a third way in which the Government was responsible for the loss. As the price of sugar dropped in the United States, it rose in Argentina. It rose in Argentina because sugar was going out of Argentina, and it was coming into the United States. These claimants had an opportunity to sell their sugar in Argentina, not at a loss, but at a profit, but the Government of the United States said, "You can not sell a pound in Argentina." If I had more time I could state this matter in greater detail, but these are the principal reasons why this resolution should pass. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from North Carolina use some of his time?

Mr. POUL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that there ought to be an equal division of time on this rule between those who favor it and those who are opposed to it, but that does not seem to be the status of things as they are being managed here to-day.

Here is a rule that ought to be defeated. A claim involving $2,000,000, on which 483 pages of testimony were taken, is to be decided at the close of 30 minutes' debate on a side. Seven or eight months ago we had three hours' debate on this question. The proponents of the rule realized that they were beaten when the facts were presented. Over our protest they postponed the matter, thinking they would pass it after the election, and that is what they are trying to do now.

No one is more anxious for the United States to pay all of its just obligations than I. On the other hand, I am as anxious as anyone can be that the Government shall not pay any unjust claims. Much has been said on these sugar resolutions. In an effort to tear away the cobwebs and get at the very truth of this matter I am going to state the facts as they occurred just as simply as I can.

In April, 1920, the price of sugar in this country was high. There was some surplus sugar in the Argentine. The American Trading Co. was an importing corporation. B. H. Howell & Co. were general sugar distributors all over the world, and they and their correlated companies owned large sugar plantations in Cuba and elsewhere.

One would think from some of the discussions here that the American Trading Co. and B. H. Howell & Co. were drafted, that they were conscripted, if you please, into bringing in the Argentine sugar. Now, let us see whether this is true. Just in this connection I want to read you from page 20 of the hearings of January, 1921:

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Who first brought up the subject of sugar from the Argentine?

Mr. FRANKLIN. I am unable to say that. It was in connection with a discussion in the State Department as to duties, and we were asking about export and import duties, and the question came up then. I do not know but what I may have said that there were sugars in the Argentine and sugars in Java, etc., and so on. They suggested that we tell the Department of Justice about it. We told the Department of Justice about that transaction in April, and then heard nothing more from it at all until May 7, at which time we were called down here to the meeting. It was about April 20, as I remember it, when I was in Washington in connection with other matters.

Quoting further:

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. How did this thing start and how did it develop?

Mr. FRANKLIN. Well, it started exactly as I have told you. In April we told the Department of Justice that this sugar was there.

Thus it will be seen that Mr. Franklin first gave the information to the State Department; they requested him to go to the Department of Justice with the information. He did so, and thus furnished to the Department of Justice the information on which this whole transaction started.

At that time there was a sugar embargo in the Argentine. In order that sugar might be brought out of the Argentine and into the United States, the State Department undertook to get the embargo lifted. During the month of May—that is, on May 14, 15, and 18—the American Trading Co. purchased the sugar that furnishes the basis of this claim. On May 22, 1920, the embargo was lifted and any sugar company in the world, wherever located, could bring in sugar from the Argentine up to 100,000 tons, provided they deposited in the Argentine 30 per cent of what is known as pilet sugar, to be resold down there in the event the market there was materially affected. On June 23, 1920, even this last condition was removed, so that any importer might bring in sugar without any deposit of pilet sugar in the Argentine.

Now, notwithstanding this sugar was purchased in May, and notwithstanding the embargo was lifted on May 22, and all conditions were removed on June 23, this sugar was not brought into the United States until the month of August, 1920. The market kept going up in this country and did not begin to break until July 13, when sugar broke 2 cents per pound and thereafter began to decline. Thus this company had nearly two months after the embargo was lifted before the sugar market broke, and it had 20 days after all restrictions were removed before the sugar market broke, and yet it did not bring in the sugar until nearly three months after the embargo was lifted.

These are the exact dates taken from the sworn testimony of those who presented the claims.

There must be some motive for this delay. I am going to show what I think that motive was. James H. Post was one of the partners in B. H. Howell Co., the distributor. James H. Post was a director in the Cuban-American Co., in the National Sugar Refining Co., and in 12 other sugar companies, which companies owned vast estates in Cuba and elsewhere where sugar was produced in great quantities. I undertake to say that these claimants did not want to bring this sugar in from the Argentine, that they wanted to control the situation, hook the Government, hold back the Argentine sugar, and feed the high-priced market in the United States gradually with their sugar from Cuba, Java, and elsewhere. In other words, what is popularly known as the Sugar Trust was trying to control the sugar situation, for while the American Trading Co. tried to create the impression at first that they were not engaged in the sugar business, yet as a matter of fact they were general importers and they were associated in this transaction with the B. H. Howell Co., who were engaged in the general sugar business.

Now evidently the B. H. Howell Co. knew of these vast quantities of sugar owned by their company in Cuba and elsewhere, because they actually owned the sugar and the estates which produced the sugar, and the market was finally broken by virtue of the importation of sugar not from the Argentine but from other points and by virtue of the great quantities of sugar which were available.

During this period the Sugar Equalization Board was licensing all sugar companies in this country and was controlling the profits, allowing 1 cent per pound profit to the sugar wholesaler. The claimants were not the purchasing agents of the Government; they were merely licensees like all other companies. These companies were rather artistic in their dealings. While the profits on all sugar were being limited to 1 cent per pound they threw in together, one of them bringing it in and the other distributing, so that they each received 1 cent per pound—in other words, doubled the profits. This sugar, according to Mr. Franklin's own testimony, was purchased in the Argentine for between 13 and 14 cents per pound. Here I quote from page 15 of the hearings of January 8, 1921:

Mr. JONES. What did you pay for the sugar that you purchased down there?

Mr. FRANKLIN. I am coming to that. I can answer that question right here. About 13 cents, United States currency.

Now accepting the American Trading Co.'s own estimate as to various items of expense, including the cost of delivering in the Argentine, the freight, the insurance, the interest on the money invested, and the warehousing, the cost laid down in New York with storage paid was only 18.34 cents per pound, and if you permit their own estimate as to the cost of refining the part of it which they claim needed refining, it was only 19.43 cents per pound, everything included, with all the padding they cared to make.

They were permitted to sell this sugar at 2 cents per pound above this, figuring 1 cent profit to each company. This was twice the profit that other companies were allowed at the same time. It is conceded by Mr. Franklin and all of the witnesses that the Government never agreed to stand any losses, that nothing was ever said about the loss in the contract that the claimants made. The contractors furnished the money and handled the sugar and were to get all the profits. Where do you get agency in such a contract? Who ever heard of such a contract of agency? Did you ever hear of an agent in your life who was to make all the contracts, handle all the products, do all the financing, get all the profits, furnish all the money? The whole proposition is absurd. And yet after all this, after they have handled all the transactions and received all the profits they want the Government to shoulder all the losses. The absurdity of such a proposition is clearly proven by the mere statement of the facts in the case.

But this is not all; not only were these companies trying to keep sugar from coming in from the Argentine and to feed the high-priced market with their own sugar, native grown and elsewhere, in which they continued to fix their own price, but they made contracts all over the United States to furnish sugar at 22.5 cents per pound.

I have in my hands a number of copies of the American Sugar Bulletin. Here is a front-page headline, dated December 18, 1920: "Files suit to enforce repudiated contracts. Franklin Sugar Refining Co. brings suit for $90,000 against Reeves, Parvin & Co., of Philadelphia, and for $84,000 against John Scott & Co., of Philadelphia. February 12, 1921: Other suits to enforce repudiated sugar contracts. American Sugar Refining Co. brings suits against a number of other companies. Sugar sales 22.5 cents per pound. February 26: Another suit for enforcement of sugar contracts by Franklin Sugar Co. February 19, 1921: Refiners bring more suits to enforce broken contracts. March 5, 1921: Bring two more suits to enforce contracts. April 9: American Sugar Refining Co. and Franklin Sugar Refining Co. bring two more suits to enforce contracts. April 23: Another suit for enforcement of sugar contracts by Franklin Co. May 14: Another suit by the American Sugar Refining Co. On May 21 another suit. On May 28 two more suits."

And so it runs.

All of these were suits on contracts made by these companies for sugar to be sold throughout the United States for 22.5 cents per pound.

Oh, these fellows were wise. While the sugar was high and while they were holding back the Argentine sugar and while they controlled immense quantities of sugar in Cuba and elsewhere they were making contracts all over the United States for the delivery of sugar at 22.5 cents per pound. What an absurdity for them to want Uncle Sam to play walking Santa Claus in the face of such transactions as these.

This is the best-organized raid on the United States Treasury that has ever come within my observation. Any loss which they may have sustained on the pittance of Argentine sugar was a mere bagatelle. They were doing high financing on a tremendous scale, and were undertaking not only to hook the United States Government but the business men throughout the United States. I pronounce the whole thing a gigantic fraud, a pretentious holdup, a legislative outrage.

Even if the whole thing had been in good faith they would not be entitled to recover, for this is a question of the adoption of a policy, and if the United States undertook to refund all losses that arose out of the war there would be no place to stop. Wheat was $3 per bushel. The Government, over night, fixed the price at $2, thus occasioning great losses to the farmers, elevator men, and wheat buyers; and dealers who on one day had paid $2.80 and $2.90 cash for wheat were compelled to sell next day for $1.80, $1.90, and $2.10. These are much greater sacrifices than could possibly have been involved in the case at bar.

During the war and the aftermath of the war many people were called upon to make sacrifices. All over this country property losses were involved in the necessary action of the Government in the prosecution and winning of the war. Bright-eyed, ambitious American boys were taken from their vocations and their employment at salaries ranging from $1,200 to $10,000 per year and required to serve at $30 per month. Some of them in addition gave an arm, an eye, their health, and many their lives for the common good. All over this country there are men with empty sleeves, with wooden legs, who with awkward footsteps are undertaking to make a livelihood. In many homes there are vacant chairs. It cost seas of blood, broken hearts, and billions of treasure to win the war. If the American Government is going to make appropriations to sugar claimants for any seeming losses, should it not likewise take care of these? Such a monstrous proposition as this claim outrages the sense of justice and shames those who countenance it. It ill becomes these claimants to cry about losses on sugar transactions that only involved a few thousand tons from the Argentine when they have never at any time seen fit to even suggest a division with the United States Government for all of the millions which they made out of high-priced sugar from their vast estate in Cuba and elsewhere.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POUL. Mr. Speaker, there ought not to be much controversy about this matter, because all of the substantial facts are admitted. The resolution provides not for any appropriation of money, not a dollar to be taken out of the Treasury, but that the President of the United States be authorized to have the Sugar Equalization Board investigate these claims, and if, in the opinion of the President of the United States, the claims are honest, just, and right, they will be paid and not otherwise. The entire matter is referred to the President. This sums up the purpose of the resolution now before the House.

Now, let us not get away from that fact. Not a dollar of money appropriated by any resolution upon which we will vote to-day. Why these claims? In 1920 the Government of the United States was engaged in the business of attempting to break the price of sugar. I say that no business man under the shining sun with any degree of common sense would have brought sugar into the United States with the Government attempting to break the price, except under specific guaranties. That is exactly what took place here. These gentlemen took the place of the Sugar Equalization Board. If the Sugar Equalization Board, which had ceased to function at that time, had brought this sugar in, the loss would have been the same and the Government would have borne the loss. Certain companies are merely substituted for the Sugar Equalization Board, and they have sustained an enormous loss. By Executive order the Department of Justice had taken over the duties and activities of the Sugar Equalization Board. The American people have had the benefit of the break in the price of sugar caused by the campaign inaugurated by Attorney General Palmer and his assistants. You can not play heads I win and tails you lose. The Government can not in justice hide behind its sovereignty and force the men who brought in this sugar to sustain the loss. The Attorney General was doing the best he could to break the price of sugar. He succeeded, and is entitled to the thanks of all the American people.

Mr. Palmer and his associates and Mr. Rily had inaugurated this campaign to break the price of sugar, and that campaign was in part made successful by these gentlemen who brought in this sugar for the very purpose of breaking the price. They were practically at all times agents of the Government.

I see no reason for discussing the question of whether they might have imported Argentine sugar a little sooner or did not do so. They were making a certain profit that was agreed upon in advance by A. Mitchell Palmer's department, and they were doing the best they could. Of course, all transportation was at that time more or less difficult.

They had agreed upon a profit which could not be in excess of 1 cent a pound for bringing the sugar in and 1 cent a pound for distributing it. I submit no business man would bring in a great supply of sugar with that small profit except under a guaranty that he was going to find a purchaser when the sugar got here. One of these companies had a ship at Buenos Aires partly loaded. This company ordered the cargo discharged and reloaded the ship with this sugar to be imported into the United States in order to break the price. The ship immediately began its voyage to New York and the price began to go down. The company asked permission to turn the ship around and send it back to the Argentine, but the Attorney General said, "No; bring it into the United States, as you agreed." When the sugar got to New York the representative of the importing company said, "Where are the persons to whom the sugar is to be delivered? You told me you would have purchasers ready." Mr. Rily said, "I don't know; the market is demoralized. The price is down. I don't know where any purchasers are and I can't do anything for you." The company said, "Can we put the sugar in warehouses?" "No," the department answered; "if you do, we may have to prosecute you for hoarding." "Where is my relief?" said the company representative to Rily, and Rily said, "I can do nothing for you."

Mr. LAZARO. Who was Rily?

Mr. POU. Rily was a special assistant to A. Mitchell Palmer under the Wilson administration. He had the handling of the sugar problem; he was put there by Palmer, and Palmer indorsed his acts. In cooperation with the companies named in this resolution he was trying to break the price of sugar, and he and they succeeded.

Why, gentlemen of the House, it would be a breach of faith on the part of the Government to repudiate these transactions.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. For a very brief question.

Mr. SNELL. Is it not a fact that every man connected with the two administrations that knows about the transaction approves of this legislation?

Mr. POU. Certainly; every official of the Wilson administration connected with these transactions says a high moral obligation is involved. Mr. Palmer and Mr. Rily and every official of the Wilson administration who had any connection with these importations of sugar takes the position that the Government can not honorably force the loss upon the importers who were merely agents of the Government; and then a hostile administration came in which would have been glad, probably, in a political battle to have found some point to criticize in the action of the former administration, but Mr. Daugherty, the Attorney General, and every official of his office, who had supervision of the sugar problem, take the same position. They all say there is a highly moral obligation on the part of the Government to pay these claims. I would be ashamed of my Government if, under these circumstances, it repudiated the transaction. [Applause.]

Now, gentleman, that is about all there is to this matter. And yet we took up a whole day discussing the claim of the B. H. Howell Co. and the other company. I have read the arguments of my splendid young friends who are fighting this resolution. The only thing that caused me to hesitate was their earnestness, but when you read their arguments they are distinctly technical. It is the argument of a lawyer honestly misled, no doubt, by technicalities when there is a great moral principle involved which ought to control.

The Government of the United States should be an example of fair and square dealing with every one of its citizens. The people of the United States have gotten the benefit of the decline in the price of sugar. The price went from 28 cents a pound down to 8 cents a pound as the result of the campaign inaugurated by Attorney General Palmer. Submit the matter to the people of the United States, to their fair and just judgment. They will not repudiate an honest obligation. The Sugar Equalization Board made $39,000,000 clear profit upon the sugar crop of Cuba. When the Sugar Equalization Board ceased to function the sugar was imported in the only way it could be brought in, by appealing to patriotic private citizens and their companies, and when they sustained a loss, lo and behold, we find gentlemen here who say that they must be ruined, because these men will go into bankruptcy, I am told, on account of these transactions—we must ruin these men who were trying to help the American people, and keep our $39,000,000 of profit which we made on the Cuban sugar crop. Gentlemen, this House can not afford to take such a position as that. I do not believe that this House will take such a position as that. The only thing that the proponents of this resolution are asking is the just and righteous thing, and the just and the righteous thing is for the Government to make good the pledge of its servants. In any event, I think we can trust the President of the United States, who by this resolution is referee, because I think we have never had a President who could not be trusted to treat the citizen fairly. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that under the rules of the House, where the previous question is ordered upon a resolution of this kind, before there has been debate, the time is automatically divided, 20 minutes on a side, one-half to those favoring the resolution and one-half to those opposing it. That rule is not being followed here, in that only 5 minutes have been given out of the 40 minutes to those who oppose the resolution, and I claim that it is in violation of the rules of the House to so apportion the time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had no knowledge how gentlemen on the Committee on Rules stood. The Chair recognized the chairman of the Committee on Rules for 20 minutes and then the ranking minority member of the Committee on Rules for 20 minutes. The Chair thinks that they have the right to use the time according to their judgment.

Mr. BLANTON. And that that can be done regardless of the rule which provides 20 minutes shall be given to those in favor of the resolution and 20 minutes against?

The SPEAKER. Does the rule say that?

Mr. BLANTON. That is my recollection of the rule, where the previous question is ordered without debate. It occurs to me that we have had so far a very unfair division of the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. The rule provides:

One-half of said time to be given to debate in favor of and one-half to debate in opposition to.

Mr. BLANTON. I insist that there shall be an equal division of the time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was not aware that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Pou] was in favor of the resolution. The Chair recognized him, as he always does the ranking member of the minority. The Chair thinks the time ought to be equally divided between those in favor of the resolution and those who oppose it. As it is, 15 minutes have been used in favor of the resolution and 5 minutes have been used in opposition to it.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, how much time did I use?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman used 10 minutes.

Mr. POU. I am perfectly willing to cut the time. I have yielded five minutes of my time against the rule, and I shall yield five minutes more time against the rule.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. Is it not true that while the rule provides as has been suggested, yet that the time to assert that right is when the gentleman in charge of the rule yields the floor, reserving the remainder of his time? At that time I think those who opposed the rule should have demanded recognition.

Mr. BLANTON. We took it for granted that the minority side would grant such time.

The SPEAKER. Of course, it is the custom always to recognize the ranking member of the minority of the Committee on Rules, but the Chair thinks that when the minority member is on the same side as the majority member, half of the time should be given, as he has given it, to those who oppose the resolution. The Chair is disposed to think that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] should also give half his time, if members on the Republican side desire it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I have had no requests from this side of the House for time on the rule.

Mr. BLANTON. We request some now.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I made the request.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; the gentleman from Texas did, but I distinctly said just now that no one on this side of the House, meaning the Republican side, had requested time.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not recall that it has ever been held in the House that the Chair is responsible for the division of time. It is the almost universal rule for the Chair to recognize the chairman of the committee and the ranking minority member of the committee. Those gentlemen have, under the almost universal practice in the House, divided the time under the rule.

The SPEAKER. That is very true, and, as the Chair stated, the Chair was not aware how either of the gentlemen stood.

Mr. MONDELL. The Chair having recognized these two gentlemen, it is for them to decide, it seems to me, under the rules of the House how they shall allot the time.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that there was almost no division in the Committee on Rules. I think that the opponents of the resolution have had more than their share of the time according to the sentiment of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BLANTON. But that is not what the rule of the House says.

The SPEAKER. According to the invariable practice, the Chair recognized the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from North Carolina, but the Chair does think that those gentlemen ought to so arrange that the time both for and against is equally divided.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I make this suggestion, Mr. Speaker: Matters of debate from a committee, of course, are within the rule that where the previous question is ordered there shall be 20 minutes on a side, 20 minutes for and 20 minutes in opposition to the matter under consideration. Here is a matter from the Committee on Rules upon which there seems to be unanimity of opinion from that committee. The chairman of the committee moved the previous question. The previous question was ordered. That automatically gave the chairman of the committee 20 minutes and the ranking minority member of the committee 20 minutes. At that time no gentleman on either side of the House protested that he was opposed to this resolution and asked to control the time in opposition to it. No member of the Committee on Rules asked for time in opposition to this resolution. If any member of the committee had asked for it, he would have undoubtedly been recognized by the Speaker to control the time in opposition to the rule.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Other gentlemen, having no knowledge of the information submitted to the Committee on Rules, ask now at the conclusion of one-half the time for debate on this resolution to control the time in opposition to it.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For a question.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The gentleman remembers that I came to him endeavoring to secure some time?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman is not a member of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture, and the gentleman stated that some stranger—

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And the gentleman has spoken for hours on this question.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Out of order and in order.

Mr. KINCHELOE. And the committee proponents of this question, seeing they were beat that day, rose and would not have a vote on it—

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I submit that it will inaugurate a new régime in this House to say that after debate has progressed until it is disclosed that the committee in charge of a bill are unanimously in favor on a matter, where the previous question has been ordered, that then some gentleman may arise and say that the time should have been divided. The request to control time in opposition should be made immediately after the previous question is ordered.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. May I make a statement?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, it seems that I am unfortunate in that I am not a member of the great Committee on Rules. There are 423 of us who are thus unfortunately situated, and yet, we have rights under the rules of the House, and I am sure the Speaker is going to see that we get them.

We can not tell whether members of the Rules Committee are in favor of a proposition until we hear them speak. The Chair recognized the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU]. We found out when he spoke that he was in favor of the resolution. Then, Mr. Speaker, I took the floor and called for the rule which gives 20 minutes on a side. I think in all fairness—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BLANTON. I submit that the Record will support my statement. The gentleman from Kansas should give 10 minutes of his time to those opposing the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken. At the time the gentleman called attention the gentleman from North Carolina had spoken for 10 minutes. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair does not think any point of order rises—

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, it appears to me this involves a matter of much importance to the House. The rules provide for an equal division of time, 20 minutes for and 20 minutes against.

By custom the matter of apportionment of that time is left with the ranking member of the Rules Committee on each side, and of course the Speaker does not know until a speech is made on which side the Member speaking may stand, but when it develops that 20 minutes of time has been used by one side, that fact is before the Speaker. The rule is above custom. The rule provides that one-half of the time shall be on each side, and however it may be handled by the Committee on Rules, when it appears to the Speaker that 20 minutes has been used on one side of a question, under the rule the Speaker, if objection is made, can not recognize any one for further debate upon that side of the question. Otherwise this would leave the House in a dangerous situation. The Committee on Rules might many times be fully in accord as to a rule, be all on one side of a question, and if it is to be held that the Committee on Rules may so manipulate the apportionment of time as to have debate almost wholly on one side or even to the extent of all on one side and none on the other, what position is the House in?

Now, the rule was to prevent that situation, and the only way that appeals to me of enforcing it is, as I suggest, in the yielding of time, the Committee on Rules controlling the time, when 20 minutes have been used on one side no one else can be heard on that side. In other words, in this particular situation when five minutes more shall have been used in favor of this rule, further debate in favor of the rule is exhausted and further debate on that side impossible, and if no member of the Committee on Rules wants to speak in opposition, those not on the Committee on Rules are entitled to recognition under the rules of the House.

Mr. ASWELL. Is not the time for making that division at the beginning of debate, not afterwards?

Mr. CRAMTON. The rule makes that division.

Mr. ASWELL. Is not the time for the opposition to speak when the debate begins?

Mr. CRAMTON. No; the House may not know the situation in the Committee on Rules. The House may not know.

Mr. ASWELL. It is a gentleman's business to find out.

Mr. CRAMTON. The rule stands for their protection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, to cut this matter short and avoid further delay, any gentleman on this side of the House wanting time in opposition to this rule may have it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the rule does not say one side or the other.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from Texas has had time.

Mr. MONDELL. In case of opposition to unanimous consent the opposition would be opposition to the rule, and not to the merits of the rule. In other words, the merits can only be considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Is it in order for one who opposes this rule to claim recognition?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order. The rule provides that one-half of such time shall be given in favor of and one-half in opposition. As the House is aware, it is always the custom in the House to recognize the ranking member of the Committee on Rules in favor and the ranking member of the minority against. Sometimes there is no one to oppose a rule when it is presented. The Chair thinks that so far as the Chair is aware, the House always intends to be fair and disapproves of any attempt to evade the intention of the rule, and often that is left to the acquiescence of the House. When the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] had finished and reserved the balance of his time, the Chair recognized the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] for 20 minutes.

The Chair assumed that he was against the rule, which was confirmed by his yielding to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], who opposed the rule. Then the first knowledge the Chair had that the gentleman from North Carolina was in favor of the rule was when he took the floor and occupied time for 10 minutes. The Chair thinks the point of order should be made when recognition is had. When the Chair recognized the gentleman from North Carolina, the Chair sanctioned that. But the Chair thinks that in fairness to the rule and in fairness to the House, the gentleman from North Carolina having yielded half of his time in opposition, it would be but fair that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] should yield half his time also in opposition to the rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am perfectly willing to yield now if any gentleman on this side of the House wants time in opposition to the rule. I will yield him 10 minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair permit an observation?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. CRAMTON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAMTON. How is it going to be possible for any Member of the House to have knowledge of what position a man is going to maintain on the floor when the Speaker himself says he can not have that knowledge?

The SPEAKER. It is very easy. The Chair remembers, himself, years ago when on the floor, arising and asking whether the gentleman about to be recognized was opposed to the bill or not.

Mr. CRAMTON. The Speaker would have that right.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker remembers having done it when he was a Member on the floor.

Mr. CRAMTON. The Member on the floor does not know what is in the mind of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order. We must proceed with the business of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he has the right to recognize the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAMTON. A Member on the floor may not have in mind what is in the mind of the Committee on Rules. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POW], himself in favor of the rule, might have had in mind that the chairman of the committee was planning to recognize for 10 minutes some one on the other side. But each side of the question is entitled to 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. That is being accomplished at this time. The gentleman from Kansas says he will yield 10 minutes to them against the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. But the gentleman from Kansas limits his yielding to those on this side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think so.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have time against the rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Texas five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. I yielded to my colleague [Mr. JONES].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; I yielded to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Have I not the right to yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BLANTON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will occupy it myself. But I would have preferred to have given it to my colleague [Mr. JONES].

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no right to prefer a parliamentary inquiry without the consent of the gentleman occupying the floor.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I have been talking to the Speaker, but the Speaker has not been listening.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, if this is a proper resolution and if this is a proper rule making it in order it ought to bear the light of day. It ought to bear a close scrutiny. It ought to be able to stand up under proper argument and proper dissection by Members of the House who have studied the question. It comes before the House with a shadow upon it. It comes before the House with an attempt on the part of our dozen friends who have been so fortunate as to be members of the Rules Committee—and who seem to think that the other 423 Members who are not so fortunate have no say at all about it—to shut off debate and to make in order two resolutions, the first one embracing the serious proposition to take $2,500,000 of the people's money out of the Treasury, and the second to take out an additional $1,700,000 of public money, and they seem to think that we who are not members of that committee are not concerned in this at all, when this public money is to be placed in the private pockets of big corporations.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield just for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman can get time from his sugar friends on the other side.

Mr. ASWELL. This money does not come out of the Treasury. It comes out of the Sugar Equalization Board, which has $16,000,000 in the bank now.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; but that $16,000,000 came out of the pockets of every jobber and every retailer and every consumer back at home in our respective districts, and it ought to go back into the Public Treasury. Thus, as a matter of fact, this $2,500,000 which by this resolution we are to put into the private pockets of these two corporations will be paid by the people of the United States, and it is just the same as if we were now appropriating it out of their Treasury.

I would feel more favorable toward this rule if our friend from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], the great chairman of the Committee on Rules, and if our friend from North Carolina [Mr. POW], the former great chairman and now the ranking minority member of that committee, had come on the floor and said, "We are going to discuss this rule 40 minutes, 20 minutes for those who are for it and 20 minutes for those who are against it." But they gave us 5 minutes. Here is a proposition that involves $2,500,000, yet we are forced to close debate in an hour.

Why should we not take this day? Why should we vote for a rule that limits debate on a $2,500,000 proposition to one hour, when we are practically through the work of this Congress? We have passed every supply bill; we have performed our work; we have done our work expeditiously; we have already sent it to the other end of the Capitol; we have time on our hands. This is to be followed by the other resolution that is to take $1,700,000 out of the Treasury, and by the provisions of this rule we are limited to an hour and a half debate on that measure. Is that proper debate? I submit it to the gentleman from Kansas that he ought to be more fair to the membership of this House when he brings in a rule of this kind out of his hip pocket, when few Members know what is coming up. He brings it here and springs it on the House when the Members are not expecting it. I say that the people of this country are looking, not to the membership of the Rules Committee but they are looking to the 435 Members of this House for the passage of proper legislation by their votes. The gentleman from Kansas can not pass this resolution merely by the 12 votes of the Committee on Rules. He is going to ask us to vote on it. He is going to ask us to vote under our oaths of office. He ought to give us a chance to know what we are voting on. He ought to give my colleague from Texas [Mr. JONES] an hour on this proposition. My colleague from Texas has given careful study to this question. He is a member of the Committee on Agriculture that has had it under consideration. He has been working on it for weeks. He ought to give the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] an hour on it. Now, why do you not give him plenty of time to give his views to this House, to place what he knows about the matter before the membership? Then we would feel more favorable toward your resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I still have five minutes that I will yield to any gentleman who desires it.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. I should like the time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. ROSENBLOOM].

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I wish to state to you observations which I have had in mind for a considerable period of time. You have read in the newspapers of this country the questions: "What is wrong with Congress?" "Why is it that men of the old type do not present themselves as candidates for election to Congress?"

The eminent gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] made a very masterly and eloquent address on that subject some time ago.

In my opinion, proceedings such as this—passage of rules that will not permit proper consideration of legislation—merit a diminution of public esteem and respect.

We have accepted and continue to tolerate rules of procedure restricting our prerogatives as Members of Congress until our activity is confined to legalizing what is submitted by some one else. Instead of legislating, we serve as a rubber stamp to approve legislation.

Mr. ASWELL. If they are rubber stamps, what do they stamp?

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. They stamp the bills that are submitted by commissions, by the Sugar Equalization Board, by members of the Cabinet, and by some committees. Many bills have been passed here with but a single argument in their favor. The Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of War, or some other Cabinet officer indorses it, and consideration by Members of the House is deemed superfluous.

The tariff bill was considered here for but a few hours, and in the Senate it was considered for months.

This session has been a revelation. Bill after bill has been presented by a committee with but practically no argument—a letter from the head of some department. If those officials are the best judges, why are we asked by our constituents to pass upon the merits of legislation? Why, in fact, is the legislation submitted to us at all?

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROSENBLUM. I have very little time. I will yield if there is any left. The point I make is this: The trouble with Congress is that we have ceased to legislate and that we merely legalize. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROSENBLUM. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman does not intend to have us understand that he approved of the protracted debate on the tariff bill at the other end of the Capitol, did he?

Mr. ROSENBLUM. No; but I do approve the fact that there was sufficient time to consider the items.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will not the gentleman agree with me that that very fact that the tariff bill was under consideration so long at the other end of the Capitol is one of the troubles that we have had on this side of the House?

Mr. ROSENBLUM. I did not have any such trouble, because I voted to recommit that bill. Now, are there any other questions?

Mr. BLANTON. They are through. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the House having listened twice within 40 minutes to the same speech by the gentleman from Texas, I presume we have had all there is to be said on that side of the question. The resolutions made in order by this resolution have passed the Senate, I think, by unanimous vote—one of them twice. They have been reported by unanimous vote from the committees of the Senate. There seems to have been no opposition to the Government doing the fair thing by those who brought sugar into the United States for the purpose of breaking the sugar market and bringing down the high price of sugar until the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Kentucky thought they had discovered a mare's nest somewhere. The fact is the Sugar Equalization Board during the summer of 1920 was practically out of business. The price of sugar had mounted very high, the price ranging from 26 to 29 and 30 cents a pound. The Department of Justice was given authority to deal with the question. The Attorney General in his anxiety to bring down the price of sugar appointed Mr. Figg and Mr. Riley to proceed in the matter and do everything that could be done to bring down the price of sugar. The claimants in these two resolutions were authorized and directed by the agents of the Attorney General to bring this sugar in from the Argentine Republic. It was brought in, it brought down the price of sugar, it broke the market, it brought the price of sugar down from 28 and 30 cents to 8 cents a pound.

These men lost money. The Sugar Equalization Board has in its possession now $11,000,000 of money earned by that corporation in the sugar business. The resolution directs the President, being the sole stockholder of that corporation, the equalization board, to take over these matters and make such adjustment as in his judgment he deems proper. Could anything be fairer, could anything be more just, is there anything wrong about it? Is there anything about it that has a shadow over it?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For a brief question.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. It has been stated that the price of sugar broke before this sugar came in. If that is true, how did this break the price?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It was published in every newspaper in the United States that this sugar was on the way here from Buenos Aires, and that broke the market.

Mr. EVANS. Is it not a fact that most of the sugar was there after the price broke and started afterwards, and they tried to get a waiver of the embargo and could have sold the sugar?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I believe the gentleman is in error. I know that one lot of sugar was in cargo midway between here and Buenos Aires. They learned that the sugar market had broken and endeavored to get authority to return to Buenos Aires to dispose of the sugar there, and they were denied the right to do it. These are the facts in this matter.

I have been unable to understand how gentlemen can work themselves into a fury upon a matter that involves the Government's doing simple justice to those it had authorized and directed as its agents to perform certain duties for our citizens, and that is what was done here.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. FESS. With reference to breaking the market, how long would it take to break the market if it were announced that there were 100,000 tons of sugar in Argentina, and that 70,000 tons were going to be purchased by our Government?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. A day would do it, and it was published to the world that this sugar was on its way to the United States, and the price went down.

Mr. KNUTSON. And was it not implied by this Government that infinitely more sugar was on its way from Argentina than was actually on its way, in order to depress the market?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think that was done.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the resolution.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division of the questions in the resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There is but one resolution.

Mr. JONES of Texas. But one portion of the resolution deals with Senate Joint Resolution 12, and another portion of the resolution deals with Senate Joint Resolution 79.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this is not divisible for the reason that it is a resolution from the Committee of Rules and becomes a rule of the House and does away with the other rules.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Rules for years has brought resolutions in making one, two, three, and in some instances a large number of bills in order. This is one resolution, and there never has been a division of the question in this way to my knowledge within the past 10 years.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, two distinct claims are taken care of in the resolution. Some Members of the House think that one claim is just, and some that the other claim is just. A man may want to vote for one and not for the other, but he would have to vote for the consideration of both resolutions if the vote be taken en bloc.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The same resolution provides for the consideration of two separate resolutions.

Mr. JONES of Texas. But an hour and a half is given to the discussion of one and but one hour to the discussion of the other.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We gave an additional hour to the discussion of one which had already been discussed for three hours, and an hour and a half to the discussion of the other.

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds that there is a precedent for dividing the rule, although at first blush the Chair would have thought that the statement made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] was correct. Therefore, the Chair thinks that this is divisible, and the vote will first come upon the portion of the rule which applies to Joint Resolution No. 12. The question is on that portion of the resolution applying to Senate Joint Resolution No. 12.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 119, noes 54.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote upon the ground that there is no quorum present, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question is on that portion of the resolution applying to Senate Joint Resolution No. 12.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 197, nays 104, answered "present" 1, not voting 125, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The question is on agreeing to the second part of the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced the yeas seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. KINCHELOE and Mr. BLANTON) there were—yeas 124, noes 60.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on account of no quorum being present, and make that point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-one Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky demands the yeas and nays. Thirty-six gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused, and the motion is agreed to. Under the rule the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the resolution.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HICKS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate Joint Resolution No. 12, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 12) authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 13,902 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic.

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over from the corporation, American Trading Co., and the copartnership, B. H. Howell, Son & Co., a certain transaction entered into and carried on by said corporation and copartnership at the request, under direction and as agents of the Department of Justice and Department of State, which transaction involved the purchase in the Argentine Republic, between the 13th day of May, 1920, and the 22d day of May, 1920, of 13,902 tons of sugar, the importation thereof into the United States and the distribution of a portion of the same within the United States, and to require the said United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to dispose of any of said sugar so imported remaining undisposed of, and to liquidate and adjust the entire transaction in such manner as may be deemed by said board to be equitable and proper in the premises, paying to the corporation and copartnership aforesaid such sums as may be found by said board to represent the actual loss sustained by them, or either of them, in said transaction, and for this purpose the President is authorized to vote or use the stock of the corporation held by him, or otherwise exercise or use his control over the said United States Sugar Equalization Board and its directors, and to continue the said corporation for such time as may be necessary to carry out the intention of this joint resolution.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KINCHELOE. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Under this rule one-half the time is to be controlled by those who are against the resolution and one-half by those who are in favor of the resolution. I was wondering whether it is in order for the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD], who is in favor of and in charge of the bill, to ask unanimous consent that the time may be divided equally.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels it is not necessary to make that unanimous-consent request. The Chair is going to recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] to control the time of those who are in favor of the bill and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] to control the time in opposition to the bill. Under the rule 60 minutes have been set apart for debate on this resolution, 30 minutes in control of those who are in favor and 30 minutes for those who are in opposition. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] for 30 minutes.

Mr. WARD of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair notify me when I have used seven minutes? Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I am going to make a very brief statement, giving the true facts and conditions that made necessary Senate Joint Resolution No. 12.

Early in April, 1920, the State Department learned of a surplus of sugar in Argentina, which information was communicated to the Department of Justice. An acute shortage existed in this country, with sugar retailing from 25 to 30 cents per pound. The Department of Justice, with the cooperation of the State Department, acting under authority of the Lever Act, arranged for the importation of a large part of this surplus sugar to relieve this situation and to break the price.

These departments lacked both funds and an organization to promptly carry out such an undertaking. Upon assurances by the State Department that the Argentine sugar embargo would be lifted on request of the United States Government, the American Trading Co., of New York, with a branch office in Buenos Aires for 30 years, was appointed purchasing agent of the Department of Justice to buy and import the sugar. The Department of Justice then asked B. H. Howell, Son & Co., of New York, to distribute the sugar to a list of purchasers approved by it. The commission fixed by the Department of Justice at 1 cent per pound for each company, the testimony shows, was very reasonable.

The Department of Justice, by letter dated May 11, 1920, instructed the American Trading Co. to immediately buy as much sugar as possible, and simultaneously requested, through the State Department, the lifting of the Argentine embargo. Through inability of these departments to secure the permit promptly, the company was delayed more than a month and a half in arranging the importation of the total purchase of 13,902 tons. Meantime much publicity was given the transaction, the market weakened, and when the sugar was offered in the United States only 5,000 tons could be sold.

To avoid any loss, the companies urged the resale in Argentina of the unshipped sugar, but the State Department and Department of Justice refused this suggestion by letter of August 2, 1920, thus preventing such resale. On August 11, 1920, this Government officially offered the unshipped sugar to the Argentine Government at approximate cost, but this offer was declined. All of the sugar—13,902 tons—was brought to the United States and sold at a loss of approximately $2,500,000. The break in the market which this importation is acknowledged to have started saved hundreds of millions of dollars to the American people, and these Government agents should not be required to stand the loss incurred in performing this service. This measure only provides reimbursement without compensation, and enables these agents to repay the money borrowed to finance the transaction.

During the extensive hearings Attorney General Daugherty and Attorney General Palmer appeared and urged, as a matter of equity and justice, that relief should be granted these companies, who acted merely as the agents of the Government. All of these facts were established in the hearings by letters, official cables, and other documentary evidence.

This bill does not require an appropriation, but simply provides administrative authority for the liquidation of the transaction from the surplus funds of the United States Sugar Equalization Board. This board has examined this case and are unanimously in favor of this resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. WARD of New York. For a question.

Mr. SNYDER. Just for a question. Is it not a fact those nine millions this Government is getting is part of the profit the Government made in the sugar business?

Mr. WARD of New York. Yes. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the distinguished gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. WARD of New York. I can not yield.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], chairman of the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York has referred to the Lever Act lacking in funds. He should have added lacking in authority for any official of the Government to enter into a contract to buy or sell sugar, or to guarantee anybody against a loss or to make good any loss. The statement of the Attorney General and the statement of Mr. Figg, the only ones who had anything to do with the transaction on the part of the Federal Government, so stated. The claimants do not claim that there is any legal obligation. In fact, the claimants admit they had no agreement or understanding that the losses should be made good. So it resolves itself into this: It is merely a moral obligation, as has been stated by Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas and other gentlemen—a moral obligation. Now, gentlemen, the question is if the Government or if the Congress is to recognize and to make good its millions of moral obligations—if so, why single out this particular one, one which has been granted special privileges, first to be given a profit of 2 cents a pound, and, as the gentleman will recall, Congress passed an act authorizing the President of the United States to take over the Cuban sugar. Had the President exercised the power suggested by Congress, these people would have sold their sugar at a much lower price than the price sold at; they were large holders; they would have sold their sugar at about 5½ cents a pound, instead of the price which they were allowed to sell it for—about twice that amount. The other privilege was they might be excused from the deposit of 30 per cent of pilot sugar, required of other exporters. The De Ronde people made the deposit, and had no difficulty in importing sugar at the time which they desired.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAUGEN. I have only five minutes. Just a question, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUSTED. I just want to ask the gentleman—

Mr. HAUGEN. I am simply correcting the gentleman's statement.

Mr. HUSTED. I want to ask the gentleman if he was aware the American Trading Co. purchased every pound of the thirteen thousand and some odd tons of sugar before the pilot embargo decree was issued in the Argentine?

Mr. HAUGEN. Oh, they had no trouble in importing afterwards—

Mr. HUSTED. Oh, no; they bought all their sugar—

Mr. HAUGEN. I can not yield further, unless the gentleman will give me additional time.

Let us see about this embargo. The question was asked:

I understood you to say that no agency of the Government or department of the Government was in any way derelict but did everything they could to assist these people?

Here is Mr. Figg's answer:

I think the Government was trying in every way possible. If there was any failure anywhere on the part of the Government, it was due to the American ambassador.

Now, what did he have to say about the sale of the sugar? He said it could not be done without creating trouble in Argentina. Is it suggested that the Government should interest itself to accommodate anybody importing sugar, especially after being given all these privileges and assistance to the extent of causing trouble with another nation? How about the embargo? What did Mr. Figg have to say about it? I read from Mr. Figg's letter:

After talking this over with your representatives, Mr. Linn and Mr. Giddings, it was deemed advisable that your agent already on the ground should be advised to contract for or buy as much of the entire surplus as possible before any further request was made that the embargo be lifted, as, of course, the general knowledge that this has been done will create a speculative market.

That was to prevent an inflation of prices to enable these people to purchase the sugar at a very low price and make a profit.

Now, my friends, if we are to recognize these people, if the Government is to recognize these moral obligations, why single out these gentlemen who have made profits, these gentlemen who went into it, as stated by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and others for the purpose of "breaking the price"?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. That is stated in the hearings. The only purpose was to break the price, to bankrupt the dealers of this country who had sugar on hand, to bankrupt the retail dealers of this country. All have knowledge of retail dealers all over this country who bought sugar at a cost of 25 or 30 cents a pound, and as the result of this transaction they were compelled to sell their sugar at half the price they paid for it, which bankrupted many dealers.

If we are to recognize these moral obligations, why single out these people who have caused the retail dealers to suffer loss?

Mr. MONDELL. Where in the record does the gentleman find any statement that these people have made any profit at all?

Mr. HAUGEN. They were in the sugar business.

Mr. MONDELL. Where is it stated that they made anything?

Mr. HAUGEN. They were in the sugar business, and practically everybody in the sugar business on a large scale made profits. I have pointed out to the gentleman that the President failed to authorize the purchase of the Cuban sugar crop. If the President had authorized the Sugar Equalization Board to carry out its policy and purchase the Cuban crop, the price of sugar would not have been increased to the consumers in this country.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, the gentleman is not talking about the case that is pending here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has again expired.

Mr. WARD of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, it has been said that the American Trading Co., in the line of their business, took this matter up with the Department of Justice; that it was their own idea; they started it. The American Trading Co. was transacting other business with the State Department, and when that was concluded the State Department officials said: "There is a large amount of sugar in the Argentine. Why not see if you can buy it? Go and see the Department of Justice about it." The American Trading Co. people went to the Department of Justice, and then the matter was taken up. It is said that the American Trading Co. bought this sugar secretly and early, thereby implying something underhanded or dishonest in their transaction. The Department of Justice instructed them to buy secretly, so that there could be no influence on the market in the Argentine.

Now, there is a question as to the authority conferred on the American Trading Co. They have been called the purchasing agents of the Department of Justice. There is serious doubt whether the Department of Justice had authority to employ those people or make them its agents. That is a legal question that the courts may have to pass upon. But we do find the American Trading Co.'s agent going out of the office of the Department of Justice announcing that his company had been appointed the department's purchasing agent. We find a letter written immediately thereafter by the Department of Justice to the Department of State saying that these people would take up the purchase of this sugar, and that letter called them the purchasing agents of the Department of Justice. We have correspondence between our Secretary of State, Mr. Colby, and our ambassador in the Argentine, saying over and over again that the American Trading Co. was the purchasing agent of the Department of Justice.

Mr. JACOWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. JACOWAY. I want to ask the gentleman if the record in the State Department does not disclose the fact that time and time again the correspondence between the department and our minister abroad referred to this sugar as "our" sugar, meaning the sugar of the United States?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I will speak of that. The Secretary of State instructed our ambassador in Argentina to assist these people as the purchasing agents to buy sugar for the Government. They were called "our agents." There was then a total embargo. The lifting of it was promised. A few weeks later the embargo was lifted, but on condition that pillet sugar, 30 per cent of the amount proposed to be exported should be deposited, an inferior quality of sugar in Argentina, known as pillet sugar. That demand was made on our Government. Our correspondence between the State Department and the ambassador asked that that restriction be removed. The Secretary of State said: "We have no sugar of that kind. We have no pillet sugar. Our sugar is of a different kind."

The idea runs all through the correspondence that it was the sugar of the Government of the United States; that the American Trading Co. was only acting as our agent. Finally that restriction was removed by a decree signed by the President of Argentina, in which he says: "Out of consideration to the Government of the United States and as a favor to the United States, considering the friendly relations," and so on, "we issue this decree to permit their purchasing agents, the American Trading Co., to buy and export that sugar without the necessity of depositing the 30 per cent."

Then prices in this country fell, and the suggestion was made that permission be given to sell that sugar in Argentina, where the price had gone up. The State Department said: "Yes; we will let the American Trading Co. sell the sugar down in Argentina." The State Department corresponded with our ambassador down there, and he replied: "No; that will not do at all. This is a Government transaction; and when the suggestion was made that the sugar be sold here, it was said our Government was not keeping faith with the Government and people of Argentina; it will not do at all to permit this sugar to be sold in Argentina." So permission to sell was refused by the State Department and by our ambassador in Argentina.

Then the Government of the United States itself wished to sell that sugar down there, and the State Department wrote to our ambassador asking if he could not get permission to sell "our sugar," and the Argentine Government refused the request. Now, in short, that is the situation. There was not a moment through all that transaction when it was not under the absolute control of the Government. That is why the American Trading Co. did not export earlier. There was not a moment when it was not controlled by the Government. Others brought in sugar. De Ronde & Co. did it. Lamborn & Co. did it, because they had no connection with the Government and they were able to comply with all restrictions. The State Department officials testified that the American Trading Co. was the only company with which they had anything to do. I am not speaking now of the Howell Co., which was authorized to distribute sugar. The American Trading Co. was the only company with which we had anything to do. These other people, the De Ronde Co. and the Lamborn Co., could do as they pleased. They were free agents. It is true they were acting at the request of the Federal Government, but there was absolutely no control over them by the Federal Government. There was control by the Government from beginning to end over all the transactions of the American Trading Co. by the State Department and by the Government of the Argentine.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CLAGUE] five minutes.

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

"There was no objection."

Mr. CLAGUE. Mr. Chairman, being a member of the Committee on Agriculture, before which these claims were referred, I have heard all the evidence presented before the committee since March, 1921.

Not only have I heard the evidence presented before our committee, but a number of Senators have spoken to me regarding the evidence that was taken before the Senate Committee, in reference not only to this resolution, but to the one that is to follow it. After hearing that evidence and after talking to men whom I thought had knowledge of this matter, I voted to have these claims come before the House, and I also voted in favor of reporting the claim that is to follow. Since these claims were reported by the committee I have given much study and further consideration to these resolutions and am now convinced that these resolutions should not have been reported favorably. I have become so convinced after hearing the evidence of Mr. Rily who came before the committee on another claim. At that time Mr. Rily's evidence convinced me that the evidence of Mr. Glasgow, which tended to support this claim, was absolutely erroneous, and if the evidence of Mr. Rily had been presented before our committee before these claims were reported, in my opinion they would not have been reported favorably. I wish to say at this time that in my judgment there is no legal nor moral obligation on the part of the Government to pay these claims. I say that after a thorough investigation of all the evidence presented before March, 1921, and since, and particularly since the Lamborn claim was before our committee, that there is no moral or legal obligation of any kind on the part of the Government to support these claims.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAGUE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROACH. I notice that as to Senate Joint Resolution 79, which presents the claim of De Ronde & Co., that is to follow this one, the gentleman prepared the report of the committee in that case.

Mr. CLAGUE. Yes.

Mr. ROACH. And the gentleman recommended the passage of the resolution, and as a matter of equity and justice the gentleman asked payment of the loss sustained by De Ronde & Co.

Mr. CLAGUE. Yes.

Mr. ROACH. Since the gentleman prepared that report has he had a change of heart on this subject?

Mr. CLAGUE. Yes. I am convinced that it was a mistake that these resolutions were reported favorably by the committee, and after hearing Mr. Rily in the Lamborn claim I was and am now convinced that none of the claims are either legal or moral claims against the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAGUE. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Much has been said about reducing the price of sugar from 25 or 30 cents a pound to 8 or 10 cents a pound. The gentleman will remember what happened before, when they ran sugar up from 8 cents a pound to 25 or 30 cents a pound. There was a going up first before there was a coming down afterwards.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAGUE. Yes.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Are there other claims of this kind pending before the gentleman's committee?

Mr. CLAGUE. There are other claims. The Lamborn claim is much more meritorious than this one.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. So, if we pass this, there will be other claims presented before the House?

Mr. CLAGUE. There is no question but that there are other claims, amounting to several million dollars, that will be presented if these claims are paid.

Mr. WARD of New York. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VOIGT].

Mr. VOIGT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture, I have given very careful consideration to the claim involved in this resolution. I am familiar with all the evidence in the case. While my inclination is to be opposed to claims of this nature and to regard them with suspicion, a calm and unbiased consideration of the evidence drives me to the conclusion that this is as meritorious a claim as could be presented to the Congress of the United States. I do not feel at liberty to allow political considerations to enter into my judgment in passing on the rights of these claimants, and I have considered the evidence as though I were sitting as a judge or a member of a jury.

In the short time allotted to me I can not go into many details. The Government, through the Department of Justice, employed the American Trading Co. as its purchasing agent. If you will turn to page 9 of the hearings, you will find a dispatch from Mr. Polk, Acting Secretary of State, to the American Embassy at Buenos Aires. This is dated May 13, 1920, and therein this sentence occurs:

The American Trading Co. has been appointed purchasing agent by the Department of Justice, and it is being instructed by that department to obtain quietly as many options as possible before the market is aware that the embargo has been lifted, in order to avoid unduly high prices, otherwise it will be impossible to buy Argentine sugar.

These people from start to finish were in the hands of the Government of the United States, and submitted to and were subject to its direction in this transaction.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOIGT. I can not yield in the short time I have. They were not free agents. After they purchased the sugar they could not have disposed of one pound of it without the consent of the Department of Justice. Before they bought the sugar, and as an inducement to enter into the transaction, they were assured by the State Department and the Department of Justice that for any sugar bought as purchasing agents for the Government, the embargo maintained by the Argentine Government against the exportation of sugar could be raised. It was agreed that the gross profit of the American Trading Co. should be limited to 1 cent a pound; that the sugar should only be delivered to such persons as were designated to receive it by the Department of Justice; that Howell & Son were to act as distributors of the sugar on behalf of the department; that the distributees and the amounts were to be approved by the department. On the assurance that the Government could immediately upon the purchase of the sugar secure the consent of the Argentine Government for its export, and with the above understanding the American Trading Co. borrowed and furnished between six and seven million dollars and purchased about 14,000 tons of sugar down there. After they bought the sugar it developed that our Government could not get the embargo raised, and it took six weeks of negotiation to finally get the consent of the Argentine Government to let the sugar out. During these six weeks exaggerated stories were published in the United States about the large amount of sugar coming here from the Argentine. As a consequence the price took a tumble. When the American Trading Co. realized that on account of the delay it probably could not get cost and expenses for all of the sugar in the United States, it requested permission of our Government to sell the sugar it still had in the Argentine.

At that time sugar had materially advanced in the Argentine; and if the American Trading Co. had been free to do with the sugar as it pleased, it could have resold down there and have realized a profit of a couple of million dollars. However, the company was very honorable. It made a proposition to our Government that, if permitted, it would resell the sugar in the Argentine at 16 cents per pound, when the price then was at least 7 or 8 cents more. Our State Department refused to permit this course. It seems to me this course should have been arranged, but these claimants are not responsible for the refusal of the State Department to let them sell. Then these parties were obliged to bring all of the sugar to the United States and sell it at a loss. They could not even store it, for fear of being prosecuted for hoarding.

Mr. STEPHENS. Was the sugar ever sold?

Mr. VOIGT. Most of it was afterwards sold at a loss.

Now, if you will turn to the hearings, page 11, you will find a communication from the Argentine Government, stating that permission is granted to this company to export the sugar as purchasing agent of the Department of Justice. On page 26 you will find a letter from Mr. Figg, who was the Assistant Attorney General having this transaction in charge, to the President, urging him to direct the Sugar Equalization Board to take over this transaction so as to save these people from loss.

Mr. Figg says in his letter that the action of these claimants, resulting in depressing the price of sugar in the United States, which as you may recall was then between 25 and 30 cents per pound, resulted in a saving to the American people of a billion dollars. I do not believe that, but I do believe that by reason of the stories published at the time, concerning the importation of vast quantities of Argentine sugar, the price went down materially, and I believe this venture did save the American people several hundred million dollars. Even if it did not save us a cent, I believe the Government is morally bound to save these people from loss. They acted as agents for the Government, they acted within the scope of their instructions, and it is elementary that in these circumstances the principal must back up the agent. Furthermore, our Government failed to have the embargo lifted as it agreed, which fact was responsible for the loss, and then to cap the climax it refused these people permission to resell the sugar in the Argentine when there was an opportunity for them to come out whole. They do not ask a profit now; they want the Government to stand their loss. I am going to hold this Government to the same rule of responsibility that I would hold an individual, and when that rule is adopted, the Government is absolutely bound to reimburse these people. [Applause.]

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has 21 minutes and the gentleman from New York has 16 minutes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. We have but one more speech on this side.

Mr. WARD of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. McLAUGHLIN].

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, of the many claims against the Federal Government growing out of the varied activities of the Government departments in the World War, some of them undoubtedly are just and meritorious and should be paid, while many of them are without sufficient merit and should not be paid. Among the claims that have been presented or may be presented, that of the American Trading Co. for reimbursement for the actual loss sustained by them in acting as the purchasing agent of the Department of Justice for the importation of sugar from the Argentine in a successful attempt to break the sugar market in this country has, in my judgment, been established beyond the question of a doubt. The resolution has twice passed the Senate by a 2-to-1 vote, after having been unanimously reported by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Hearings have been held in both the Senate and House committees, in which men of the highest repute and integrity have testified, representing the American Trading Co., the Department of Justice, the Department of State, and the Sugar Equalization Board. The Good Book says that by the mouth of two witnesses a thing shall be established. In support of the claim of the American Trading Co. practically all of the witnesses who have been called are in complete agreement as to the merits of the claim. A Democratic Attorney General and a Republican Attorney General, as well as a Democratic Secretary of State and a Republican Secretary of State have assured the Agriculture Committee in the hearings that were had that the claim was just and meritorious and should be paid.

Inasmuch as the details of the transaction have been thoroughly covered in the printed hearings and have been discussed on the floor of the House, I do not wish to take the time of the House, except to review some of the more important features of the evidence in support of the claim.

It is understood that under the Lever Act the President was empowered to take such steps and set such machinery in motion from time to time as might appear necessary to provide an adequate supply of food and feeds of various kinds and to facilitate the proper distribution of the same. The question of the supply and distribution of sugar was considered early under the operation of the Lever Act, and finally the United States Sugar Equalization Board was established, which, in addition to the Cuban sugars imported, imported a little less than 40,000 tons of other foreign sugars, on which a profit of $39,000,000 was made in the handling and distribution. Thirty million dollars of this amount was turned into the Treasury of the United States, and something like $9,000,000 was held back for the purpose of adjusting claims growing out of sugar transactions.

When the Sugar Equalization Board was created it was not in the mind of those arranging to handle the sugar situation in this country originally to attempt to control the sugar situation at a profit to the United States Government, but a profit of $39,000,000 was made. Now, I submit to the Members of the House that it is unfair, most decidedly unfair, that the Government of the United States should make a profit of $39,000,000 in handling the sugar situation during the war and immediately after the war, and that a private importing company, at the solicitation of the Department of State, the Department of Justice, and acting as the purchasing agent for the Department of Justice, as clearly shown in the hearings as well as in the large volume of official correspondence passing between this Government and the Argentine during the course of the transaction, should stand a loss of $2,500,000 while attempting faithfully to cooperate with the Department of Justice in their efforts to break the sugar market.

On or about April 26, 1920, Mr. Walter S. Franklin, vice president of the American Trading Co., of New York, while in conversation with Mr. Gittings, assistant to the trade adviser of the State Department, was advised by Mr. Gittings that a cablegram had been received by the State Department indicating that there was a surplus of sugar in the Argentine, and Mr. Gittings urged Mr. Franklin to call at the Department of Justice and talk with members of the department relative to the importation of sugar from the Argentine.

Mr. Franklin complied with the request the same day and talked with Mr. Newton, assistant to Mr. Figg, on the sugar situation. Later, about May 6, Mr. Linn, a Washington representative of the American Trading Co., wired Mr. Franklin that Assistant Attorney General Figg desired to see him in Washington. Mr. Franklin responded to the request and on May 7 interviewed Mr. Figg on the sugar situation. Mr. Figg, according to his own testimony in the hearings and the testimony of Mr. Franklin, informed Mr. Franklin that the Department of Justice desired to have purchased some of the surplus sugar in the Argentine and import the same to the United States for the express purpose of lowering the price of sugar here, and requested the American Trading Co. to act as the purchasing agent of the Government in the transaction. No definite arrangement was made at that time, because Mr. Franklin wanted the United States Government to find out definitely that the Argentine Government would modify the existing embargo at our Government's request. However, on May 12, 1920, Mr. Franklin received a letter from Mr. Figg, from which the following quotation is taken:

After talking this over with your representative, Mr. Linn, and Mr. Giddings, it was deemed advisable that your agent already on the ground should be advised to contract for or buy as much of the entire surplus as possible before any further request was made that the embargo be lifted, as, of course, upon the general knowledge that this has been done will create a speculative market.

I have made arrangements with very large interests to handle all or any part of this sugar that we may indicate, our principal idea being, first, to secure sugar for the United States; second, to secure the sugar at the lowest possible price; and, thirdly, to control or indicate the channels of distribution after arrival here.

I hope you will give this your immediate attention, as we must work very rapidly to beat the speculators in the market.

Yours very truly,

HOWARD FIGG,

Special Assistant to the Attorney General.

In answer to this request of the Special Assistant to the Attorney General, the American Trading Co. wired their Argentine office to begin buying sugar at a price not to exceed $300 a ton, and arranged for the proper credit with their bankers to take care of the transaction.

About this time or later the Department of Justice, entirely independent of their dealings with the American Trading Co., approached the B. H. Howell, Son & Co. and requested them to assist the Department of Justice in the distribution of the sugar in the United States, for which importation arrangements had been made with the American Trading Co., and later an agreement was made with the American Trading Co. that the Department of Justice would allow them a commission of 1 cent a pound for importing the sugar, and an agreement was also made with B. H. Howell, Son & Co. that the department would allow them a commission of 1 cent a pound for distributing the sugar after its arrival. Had these companies been able to have carried out their part of the transaction with the greatest expedition and marketed their sugar before the break in the price came neither of them would have made a net profit on the transaction of to exceed one-half cent a pound and probably not more than one-fourth cent a pound, after allowing for the overhead expenses of handling the business.

About the middle of May Mr. Franklin, of the American Trading Co., conferred with Mr. Figg, of the Department of Justice, and Mr. Gittings, of the Department of State, and among other things requested them to arrange for the lifting of the Argentine embargo so that the sugar purchase could be brought to this country. On May 13 Mr. Figg wrote the State Department asking them to arrange for the lifting of the sugar embargo, and the State Department cabled this message to the American ambassador in the Argentine:

The American Trading Co. has been appointed purchasing agent by the Department of Justice and is being instructed by that department to obtain quietly as many options as possible before the market is aware that the embargo has been lifted in order to avoid unduly high prices; otherwise it will be impossible to buy Argentine sugar.

Note that in this cablegram, and this same expression is contained many times in the official correspondence passing between the two Governments, copies of which are in possession of the Agriculture Committee, the American Trading Co. was designated as the purchasing agent of the Department of Justice. On June 8, 1920, the State Department again cabled the American ambassador in the Argentine, asking him to confer with the President of the Argentine and arrange for a satisfactory lifting of the embargo.

This was finally done, and on June 23 the necessary license was issued for the importation of the sugar to this country, and in that license the following language was used:

That the necessary permission be given to the American Trading Co., purchasing agent for the Department of Justice of the United States of America, to export to the said company 13,909 tons of sugar of national production.

Please observe that in the permission given to the American Trading Co. by the Argentine Government the words are used, "purchasing agent for the Department of Justice of the United States of America."

Owing to the long delay of the State Department in securing the lifting of the Argentine embargo and as a result of the large publicity given throughout this country to the pending importations of sugar the American Trading Co. was only able to sell 5,118 tons of the 14,209 before the break in the sugar market came.

Mr. Zabriskie, president of the United States Sugar Equalization Board and the best informed sugar man in the United States, has expressed it as his judgment that the importation of this Argentine sugar was one great factor in breaking the sugar market in this country which saved the American people hundreds of millions of dollars. The same view is expressed by Assistant Attorney General Figg and by Judge Glasgow, a member of the Sugar Equalization Board and attorney for that body. When the sugar market broke the American Trading Co. applied to this Government for permission to resell the sugar they had been unable to import to this country because of the delay in lifting the Argentine embargo back to the Argentine Government, as sugar had risen in price there, and offered to resell the sugar to the Argentine Government at a price that would not have given them more than the 1 cent profit per pound which had been agreed on with the Department of Justice.

The company was refused permission to resell in the Argentine and directed to bring all of the sugar to the United States, and as a result of the entire transaction these two companies, the American Trading Co. and B. H. Howell, Son & Co., have lost approximately $2,500,000.

The Sugar Equalization Board still has several million dollars that have not been turned in to the United States Treasury, and it is the unanimous opinion of that board that the American Trading Co. should be reimbursed for the loss sustained while acting as purchasing agent for the Department of Justice, the only question with the members of the board being that owing to the time that had elapsed and the attempted winding up of the affairs of the board at the time the question of reimbursement of the American Trading Co. and B. H. Howell, Son & Co., was proposed the board should have a definite authorization from Congress to take over the transaction and reimburse these companies for their actual losses.

The American Trading Co. and B. H. Howell, Son & Co. are not asking for any profit on this sugar transaction; they are only asking that the Sugar Equalization Board be authorized to take over the transaction, audit their accounts, and repay the companies for the actual losses sustained.

It should be borne in mind in the consideration of this transaction, that the American Trading Co. and B. H. Howell, Son & Co., acted throughout under the instructions of the State and Justice Departments, and that they were forbidden to make any move on their own account in the matter. When it came to the distribution of the sugar, B. H. Howell, Son & Co. was not permitted to go into the open market and make sales but were authorized by the Department of Justice to sell only to such persons and firms as the department might designate. Had these companies, after entering into the agreement with the Department of Justice to import and distribute Argentine sugar, been permitted, when they experienced the delay on account of the embargo, to go ahead and distribute the sugar in any manner that they might discover which would make them whole or nearly whole they could have saved a part of the loss, but they were restricted and circumscribed on every hand by the requirements of the department.

The testimony shows that all of the witnesses from the State and Justice Departments, as well as the attorney for the Sugar Equalization Board, testified that the claim of the American Trading Co. and B. H. Howell, Son & Co., constituted the very strongest possible moral obligation on the part of the United States Government, and in their judgment closely approached, if not fully constituted, a legal obligation as well.

In the case of the United States v. Realty Co., reported in One hundred and sixty-third United States, 427, at page 440, Mr. Justice Peckham says:

Under the "provisions of the Constitution (Article 1, section 8) Congress has power to pay the debts" of the United States. * * * What are the debts of the United States within the meaning of this constitutional provision? It is conceded, and indeed it can not be questioned, that the debts are not limited to those which are evidenced by some written obligation or to those which are otherwise of a strictly legal character. The term "debts" includes those debts or claims which rest upon a merely equitable or honorary obligation, and which would not be recoverable in a court of law if existing against an individual. The Nation, speaking broadly, owes a "debt" to an individual when his claim grows out of general principles of right and justice; when, in other words, it is based upon considerations of a moral or merely honorary nature, such as are binding on the conscience or the honor of an individual, although the debts could obtain no recognition in a court of law.

Congress followed this decision of the Supreme Court in its amendment to section 5 of the act approved March 2, 1919, entitled, "An act to provide for relief in case of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war and for other purposes," in providing for the reimbursement of those who produced certain ores or minerals needed in the prosecution of the war as a result of requests made by the Government.

I have in my possession 100 pages of copies of letters and cablegrams that passed between our State Department and the Argentine Government covering the negotiations in this entire transaction, in which our Government repeatedly refers to the American Trading Co. as the purchasing agent of the Department of Justice of the United States, and as has already been shown the permit issued for the exportation of this sugar from the Argentine to the American Trading Co. designates them as the purchasing agent of the United States Government, showing that both Governments had the understanding throughout the transaction that the American Trading Co. was the purchasing agent of the Department of Justice.

The American Trading Co. went ahead in good faith throughout the whole transaction in the belief that they were the purchasing agents of the United States Government. This company had not been in the business of importing sugar before entering into this transaction, nor have they been importing sugar since that time, but the testimony all shows that they entered into the matter in good faith at the request of the Government departments for the purpose of assisting the Government in its efforts to reduce the high prices of sugar that were being charged at the time.

It has been argued by some of those who oppose this resolution that certain members of B. H. Howell, Son & Co. have been prosperous and that they are in possession of considerable means. Such argument is entirely irrelevant, as anyone with an ordinary sense of justice must agree. The question of the right or wrong of a claim, if properly considered, can not take into account whether or not the person or persons to whom money is justly due are worth $1 or $1,000,000. The claim should be settled wholly on its merits, as evidenced by the testimony.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me remind the House again that the question of the reimbursement of the American Trading Co. and B. H. Howell, Son & Co. for the actual losses sustained in this transaction was unanimously approved by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, passed twice by a 2 to 1 vote in the Senate, has been twice favorably reported by the House Committee on Agriculture, has been approved, so far as the justice of the claim is concerned, unanimously by the Sugar Equalization Board, by the Departments of State and Justice of both the former and the present administrations; and when we take into account that the United States Government cleared upward of $30,000,000 on its sugar transactions during the war emergency and that this Government called these companies to its assistance in an effort to curb the high price of sugar in the United States, and that these companies worked faithfully and constantly with the departments all through the transaction, and as a result of delays occasioned by the Government and restrictions placed on the companies by the Government and sustained an actual loss in the neighborhood of $2,500,000, it does not seem possible to me that this body can render a decision to the effect that these private companies must lose $2,500,000 in this transaction when the United States Government has cleared between $30,000,000 and $40,000,000 on its sugar transactions during the war.

I therefore hope and believe that the House in its effort to mete out pure justice to these companies will join with the other bodies and departments that have passed on the resolution favorably in authorizing by a liberal majority the Sugar Equalization Board to take over this transaction and reimburse the American Trading Co. and B. H. Howell, Son & Co. for the losses they have sustained and for which reimbursement they have waited long and patiently.

Mr. WARD of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Fess].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, my only caution here is not to allow prejudice against a thing that might be a question whether it should have been done or not, to determine justice in a contract. I was one of the Members of the House that thought the dealings in the sugar matter of a prior administration was subject to criticism. Whether there was a mistake on the part of Attorney General Palmer or not is not a question to-day as to the obligation of this contract, and whether what he did in an earlier day on the sugar dealings was the cause of the scaling of the price of sugar upward was a subject of criticism or not, this much must be said, that when the price was going skyward he took this plan as his method by which he could break that scaling price; and if the first thing done, including the failure to buy the sugar crop in Cuba, was a mistake, certainly this thing of breaking the price was not a mistake. He took this method by which when sugar was selling at 30 cents a pound and promising to go yet higher the price could be brought down. The price was brought down and the people got the benefit of it. The mere announcement that the United States was about to purchase the Argentine crop was enough to break the price.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. No; I can not yield; I have only four minutes. My young friend who has just asked me to yield is one of the most sincere Members in the House. I always listen to him with interest and usually with profit; but I think he has made a terrific indictment of a Democratic Attorney General, an indictment of a Democratic Secretary of State, an indictment of the Republican Attorney General, an indictment of the Republican Secretary of State, an indictment of the Sugar Equalization Board, an indictment of the membership of the Senate, which twice passed this bill, and an indictment of the Agricultural Committee of this House.

I can not be made to believe that all of the people are either purposely wrong or unwittingly in error. I can not believe that they are subject not only to the charge of legal misinterpretation but also to the charge of moral turpitude. I started in on this matter against it because I did not like the procedure at the time. But after an examination of the record I am totally convinced that there is but one thing to do. The documents prove the Government's obligation. The Government can not afford to repudiate but should fulfill its contract whether in the onset it was a bad contract or not. [Applause.]

Mr. WARD of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask the other side now to use its time, as I have only one more speaker.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and forty-eight Members present, a quorum.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I assure you that I approach the discussion of this subject realizing the fact that I have no more responsibility in the matter than you have. I do try to discharge my duties and to be a faithful and diligent member of the Committee on Agriculture. If there has been a measure before this great committee since I have been a Member of this House that I have studied more than any other, it is this. I entered into these hearings with an absolutely open mind. I never heard of these gentlemen who are interested until they came before that committee. I want to present this thing to you as I see it.

First, what have you to pass upon? Here is a claim of the American Trading Co. and B. H. Howell & Co. for $2,500,000, to be taken out of the taxpayers' pockets. Oh, they say it will not come out of the taxpayers' pockets but that it will come out of the Sugar Equalization Board. They say that the Sugar Equalization Board made $98,000,000. They did. Where did that come from? It came out of the pockets of the consumers of sugar in this country, and I want that $98,000,000 to go into the Treasury of the United States, where it belongs, rather than into the pockets of a favored few. They have a claim of $2,500,000, De Ronde & Co. have a claim of $1,700,000, and Lamborn & Co. have a claim of $570,000. After hearing all of the evidence in all of these cases, I want to say to you now that the least meritorious of them all is that of the American Trading Co. and B. H. Howell & Co., and if you can allow their claims—and that is the first vote to be taken—then you will pass the least meritorious of the three claims.

Let us see how this came about. They talk about their being an agency of the Government. They were no more an agent to the Government than I am, either in law or in fact. It is stated here that the Secretary of State told the American Trading Co.—Mr. Franklin—about this sugar in the Argentine. These fellows were not amateurs in the business. They were not novices; they were not conscripted. They were out to make some money, and they took a chance on the assurance of the Government paying them 2 cents—one cent for Howell & Co. and the other for the American Trading Co.—and they lost; and I asked every witness who came before the committee, or some of my colleagues did, whether any agents of the Government, when they were talking about these contracts, ever said a word to the effect that if they lost in this transaction with the Government the Government would reimburse them to the extent of one red cent, and everyone of them said that there was nothing said about losses. I challenge you proponents of the bill to put your finger on a line of evidence where an agent of the Government ever said a word about reimbursing if there was a loss. Let me show you what Mr. Franklin said. Mr. Franklin was down here in the State Department on some other sugar matters—

Mr. WARD of New York. Oh, no sugar matters.

Mr. KINCHELOE. That is immaterial. He went there on private business.

Mr. WARD of New York rose.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I do not yield. He was down there on other business—it is immaterial what business—and Mr. McLaughlin asked the question, "Who first brought up the question of sugar from the Argentine?" Mr. Franklin replied:

I am unable to say that. It was in connection with a discussion in the State Department as to duties, and we were asking about export and import duties, and the question came up then. I do not know but what I may have said there were sugars in the Argentine and sugars in Java, etc., and so on.

Mr. WARD of New York. Oh, read it all.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Wait a moment. Mr. Franklin said:

They suggested that we tell the Department of Justice about it—

Not the State Department. Mr. Franklin continues:

We told the Department of Justice about that transaction in April and then heard nothing from it until May 7, at which time we were called down here to the meeting. It was about April 20 when I was in Washington in connection with other matters.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN then asked the question:

How did this thing start, and how did it develop?

Mr. Franklin replied:

Well, it started as I have told you. In April we told the Department of Justice that this sugar was there, because of a conversation we had in the State Department.

Then the contract was made, and there was no agent of the Government behind it. They came down here and agreed, not like De Ronde or Lamborn, to get 1 cent a pound, but they wanted to make a killing. They said, "If you give B. H. Howell, Son & Co. 1 cent and the American Trading Co. 1 cent, we will go and buy it."

Mr. WARD of New York. Who said that?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I do not yield, and I am not making an incorrect statement. I know what I am talking about in this record.

Mr. WARD of New York. You can not show it in the hearings.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from New York is out of order.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I am trying to get some information before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Where did the State Department come in? If they had been agents of the Government, would not it have bought the sugar in the name of the Government?

Mr. WARD of New York. They did.

Mr. KINCHELOE. It did not. Would it not have sold it in the name of the Government? These people bought it in their own name in the Argentine and they sold it here in their own name. What did they do? They made their first purchase on the 13th of May, 1920. They made their last purchase, and here is the gist of this—the contributory negligence that I want to show you—they made their last purchase on the 22d day of May, completed this, 14,000 tons, and that very day, May 22, 1920, after they had made their last purchase in the Argentine, the Argentine Republic raised their embargo.

What was that embargo? The State Department never had been called in then, no agency up to this time. They raised that embargo, saying that anyone could export to the extent of 100,000 tons of Argentine sugar to any party in the world, provided, what? That those exporters deposited 30 per cent of that export amount in pillet sugar there. Why? Because if that export caused a rise in sugar the Argentine Republic would have 30 per cent to protect their own consumers. Sugar did not decline a cent in this country until the 13th of July, nearly two months afterwards. If B. F. Howell and the American Trading Co. had shipped 14,000 tons prior to the 22d day of May, the day the Argentine Government raised the embargo, they could have taken 70 per cent of that sugar and sold it, every dollar's worth, in the United States and got their 2 cents a pound profit.

Mr. WARD of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. No. They could have disposed of 30 per cent of pillet sugar in Argentina at a bigger price than it would have sold here.

Mr. WARD of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the speaker is entitled to protection under the rule.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I am trying to get a connected statement before the committee if I can.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Why would they not do that? They wanted to make a clean-up. No coalition now with the State Department. Why do I say this claim is not as just as De Ronde and Lamborn? The De Rondos took advantage of the embargo, and so did Lamborn. The way they got stung was they did not agree to buy this sugar until several months after the American Trading Co. had. To show you, Lamborn did not agree to buy this sugar until the last of June, and yet he got his sugar at New York eight days before De Ronde & Co.'s sugar left the Argentine, four weeks before the American Trading Co. shipped a pound. What is it that the American Trading Co. and B. F. Howell wanted to do? They wanted to make a clean-up. They said, "Oh, no; we will not comply with the regulations of the Argentine Republic by the deposit of 30 per cent of pilot sugar. We will go over to the State Department and we will get the State Department as an intermediary and we will ask them to ask the Argentine Republic to raise the embargo, without any restrictions at all, so we can get all of our sugar on the market and make a clean-up of 2 cents profit." And they finally got the State Department to intercede. It did intercede, and before the embargo was finally raised the crash came on July 23. Now, let me show you. Who asked the Department of State to intercede? Mr. Franklin, to make this clean-up. He wrote a letter on July 29, and in answer to that Mr. Figg, of the Department of Justice, who interceded in his behalf to the Department of State—let us see about this agency. Now, here is what Mr. Figg says:

He also brought to my attention a matter of seeming interest to you, and that was that if any portion of this sugar was sold in the Argentine it would be a ruin to the American Trading Co. or any other American interests that might be involved as well as a very serious thing for the United States Government.

Further Mr. Figg says:

I do not feel that there is an opportunity for you or the B. H. Howell Co. to lose any money on this transaction, but that you will find a ready sale for the sugar on its arrival here. I have been assured by a great many dealers over the country that they are ready to buy on delivery, but would not contract ahead of time. I not only think there will not be any loss, but that your profits will be the same as you expected from the start.

So they would still make a profit. Now—

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Just a question.

Mr. J. M. NELSON. Is it the gentleman's contention that these parties were not the agents, but the Government was helping them?

Mr. KINCHELOE. At their urgent solicitation; yes. The man behind the gun was Mr. Post, of the American Trading Co. Let me show you. He is interested in 14 sugar companies in Cuba, in Java, and in the Argentine.

He is a member of the B. H. Howell, Son & Co. partnership. For months, when raw sugar was selling at 21 cents a pound in this country, when they were robbing the American consumers to the extent of 35 cents a pound retail for refined sugar, this Mr. Post—the brains behind all these concerns, the brains that have conducted this lobby in Washington, the most insidious since I have been a Member of Congress [applause]—is a member of 14 companies, companies that made untold millions of dollars of profits, which came out of the pockets of the husbands and housewives of this country, taking advantage of the situation and selling the sugar at 35 cents a pound, he comes before the committee and says, in substance, that love of country caused him to buy this sugar. Let me read to you what I asked Mr. Post. I read:

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Post, I want to try to get your viewpoint as a business man, if I can, of this transaction. I am frank to say I do not understand it. Of course, the purpose of the purchase of this Argentine sugar to bring to this country was to break the market. That is conceded here. That was the purpose of it, to break the market for the benefit of the consumers of America. You, of course, knew that?

Mr. Post. That was the purpose of it; yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Now, with your holdings of sugar in Cuba, and with the war over, eliminating the patriotic end of it, knowing that the purpose of buying this Argentine sugar was to break the market, I can not understand your viewpoint as a business man. I can not understand why you should go into an arrangement of that kind unless you felt that the profits you would get out of the Argentine purchase would yield a greater dividend than you would get from your sugar in Cuba. What was really your purpose in it?

Mr. Post. In the first place, B. H. Howell, Son & Co. never owned any sugar; we are commission merchants.

Mr. KINCHELOE. But the more sugar you handle the more you make?

Mr. Post. We get a commission; yes. We had not got over the feeling of loyalty to the Government that we had in the war, and the feeling that we ought to cooperate in every way we possibly could. That may seem very strange to you, but that was our purpose.

By the eternal gods, it seems awfully strange to me that the man who was making millions out of his 14 other companies by robbing the American people would go in for a philanthropic purpose of breaking the market on his own sugar, out of which he was making those millions. [Applause.] Why, of course, there are inequalities in war. War is a conglomeration of inequalities and a multiplicity of iniquities. Gentlemen, you no doubt know men in your districts who were wholesale dealers who lost thousands of dollars by buying sugar at a high price when this slump came.

They say this 13,000 tons of sugar brought up here broke the sugar market. The American people at that time were consuming 100,000 tons of sugar per week. They were consuming over 14,000 tons a day. Yet B. H. Howell, Son & Co. and the American Trading Co., with their 13,000 tons—not so much as the American people consumed in a day—are said to have broken the market, and you must take the money out of the Treasury and pay it to them. There were wholesale and retail dealers in your districts who lost money and became bankrupt after the slump came. What will you say to them? What will you say to the good housewives who bought the sugar at 35 cents? What will you say to the American consumers who contributed their untold millions to Post and his 14 sugar owners? Will you say, "Notwithstanding the American people contributed to you all these millions, notwithstanding you robbed the American people for months and months, notwithstanding you went into this scheme at your own risk and lost, notwithstanding all that, we will not only contribute the millions that we gave you when sugar was sold at 35 cents a pound, but we will take $2,500,000 of the taxpayers' money out of the Treasury of the United States and make one favorite of you?"

Gentlemen, these are private bills. They came on the calendar by a majority vote of the Committee on Agriculture. They went on the calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. They hammered and hammered the Committee on Rules in May until that committee brought out a rule. At that time the Committee on Rules were kind enough to give us three hours to permit a discussion of this matter. These people have had their day in court. To my surprise, when those three hours on that day in May had been consumed, instead of rising and reporting the resolution favorably, they rose without taking action on the resolution and quit. [Applause.]

Why did you quit? You knew you were "beaten to a frazzle." I can understand where elections change the political complexion of the personnel of the House of Representatives but I can not understand how elections changing the political personnel of the next House will change the settled convictions of the personnel in this House. [Applause.]

I do not believe you will do it. So far as I am concerned, I am no better than you are. I am no more honorable than you are. I owe no more responsibility to my district than you do to yours; but, by the eternal gods, when my service in this House ends I am going to hand back the commission that the people of that congressional district gave me as unsullied as it was when it was placed in my hands, and I believe that every other Member of the House wants to do that same thing. [Applause.] I ask you, if that is true, how in good conscience you can say to these sugar dealers, worth millions, who went into the game—who went in for profit—and were unfortunate enough to lose, "We will make you whole," and then say to the retail sugar dealers in your districts, "You have met a loss, but let it go"? During the war appeals went out to the farmers of the country, "Raise more wheat, raise more hogs, raise more foodstuffs." You went to the retailers and said, "Buy more wheat." It was then selling at $3 a bushel. Many people bought millions of dollars' worth of it at that price. The Government came on—and I am not criticizing anybody—and reduced the price to $2.20 a bushel. That difference was lost by these men who bought up sugar in order to win the war.

Are you going to say, "Let us treat all alike"; or are you going to say, "Let us take these people up and reimburse them for their loss"?

I would like to know upon what meat the B. H. Howell, Son & Co. and the American Trading Co. feed that makes them so great. How can they come and have the Rules Committee bring in a resolution which, after discussion, is beaten, and then come back with a rule allowing only 30 minutes to a side, to appropriate $2,500,000 of the taxpayers' money?

Mr. BLANTON. And this same reaction bankrupted 60 per cent of the sheepmen and cattlemen at that time?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes. There had to be sacrifices during the war. It applied to every home in this Republic. It left a vacant chair at 50,000 firesides in this Republic—50,000 mothers made the sacrifice of their sons on the altar of their country, at the same time paying 35 cents per pound for sugar brought to this country by concerns in which Mr. Post was interested, and, as one Member of Congress, I am not going to vote for this measure that asks those mothers and their husbands to dig down in their pockets and help pay these concerns $2,250,000 to reimburse them because they took a chance to make hundreds of thousands of dollars and lost. I ask you, gentlemen, in good conscience, whether you can say to the American Trading Co. and to the B. H. Howell Co. that you will discriminate in their favor? Let them share some of the hardships with the mothers and fathers who are mourning by reason of the vacant chairs around their firesides as a sacrifice to the war. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WARD of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is recognized for 10 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I feel a sense of responsibility in this matter, because when a resolution similar to this was favorably reported in the Sixty-sixth Congress and those who favored it and those who opposed it were asking, on the one hand, that a rule be given for its consideration, and, on the other hand, that there should be no rule, it became my duty to consider the matter, in order that I might advise with the gentlemen of the Rules Committee who asked my advice. I then read all of the testimony carefully. I talked with the members of the committee, those who were favorable and those who were unfavorable, after which I said to the chairman of the Committee on Rules, "I am inclined to think these gentlemen have a good case, but I do not believe they have fully established their case before the committee." I said to Mr. Franklin, "I am inclined to believe that there is an obligation on the part of the Government that should be met, but I do not believe your case has been presented to the committee clearly enough that I may properly advise that a rule be given for its consideration." And so the matter was not considered at that time and was again presented to the committee and presented logically and clearly. The facts were presented from the beginning to the end of the transaction in logical sequence.

I wish to say that it is my deliberate judgment that if there is not in this case a moral, equitable, and legal obligation, then there is never any obligation on the part of the Federal Government save under a written contract clearly and beyond all question made under a specific provision of law. This is more than a moral obligation. It is more than an equitable obligation. It is an obligation that unquestionably would be legal if the Secretary of State under the Wilson administration, if the Secretary of State under this administration, if the Attorney General under the Wilson administration, if the Attorney General under this administration had as the responsible managers of a private corporation in behalf of and in the name of the corporation done what they did in the name of the Government in this case. There is no escape from this obligation unless we are willing to say that, so far as we are concerned, no obligation of this Government should be met and paid unless it is so clearly and definitely legal under our form of government and law that the claimant may obtain relief in a court of law. We know that there are valid obligations which the Government ought not to attempt to escape toward the establishment of which the claimant can not have recourse to the courts. At the close of the war we made valid innumerable informal contracts and agreements that had been entered into during the war period, and under that legislation hundreds of millions of dollars of obligations were met. It is possible that in passing upon those obligations those charged with responsibility were not always wise and were not always sufficiently careful to guard the interests of the Government.

I do not pretend to say. I do know that it was necessary for us to pass that law or stand before the world as a Government that repudiated its obligations. Ah, like the gentleman who just took his seat [Mr. KINCHELOE], I hope that when I leave this House after my years of service I can leave it with a clear conscience; but I can not leave it with a clear conscience if I shall stand here in my place and preach repudiation of Government obligations. Either this obligation is binding upon the Government of the United States or two Secretaries of State under two administrations, two Attorneys General under two administrations, the men designated by the Departments of Justice and of State to study the case under two administrations, and those who have been officially brought into contact with it are all wrong, all prejudiced, and all controlled by unworthy motives. I am not ready to say that those men, charged with great responsibilities, did not realize their obligations to the people of this country under their oaths of office, were not sufficiently versed in law and commercial usages to recognize what constitutes a national obligation. It is all very lovely for gentlemen to be able to say, "Oh, well, I do not have to vote for a thing of this kind, and I will escape all criticism at home if I can just say, 'No; I had some doubts about those sugar claims, and so I voted to turn them down.'" I do not desire to return to my constituency laying any such unction as that to my soul. I prefer to go saying, "This obligation was presented to me. It is vouched for by the men responsible under my Government to pass judgment on it. I have read the record. I know the facts. I believe there is an obligation that ought to be met, and I propose to help meet it." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over from the corporation, American Trading Co., and the copartnership, B. H. Howell, Son & Co., a certain transaction entered into and carried on by said corporation and copartnership at the request, under direction, and as agents of the Department of Justice and Department of State, which transaction involved the purchase in the Argentine Republic, between the 13th day of May, 1920, and the 22d day of May, 1920, of 13,902 tons of sugar, the importation thereof into the United States, and the distribution of a portion of the same within the United States, and to require the said United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to dispose of any of said sugar so imported remaining undisposed of and to liquidate and adjust the entire transaction in such manner as may be deemed by said board to be equitable and proper in the premises, paying to the corporation and copartnership aforesaid such sums as may be found by said board to represent the actual loss sustained by them, or either of them, in said transaction; and for this purpose the President is authorized to vote or use the stock of the corporation held by him or otherwise exercise or use his control over the said United States Sugar Equalization Board and its directors and to continue the said corporation for such time as may be necessary to carry out the intention of this joint resolution.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: On page 2, line 18, after the word "resolution," insert the following proviso: "Provided, That the United States Sugar Equalization Board shall not pay anything in the way of profits to the American Trading Co. or to B. H. Howell, Son & Co. in such transaction."

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, there is a provision in this resolution that is a little uncertain. It authorizes the Sugar Equalization Board to dispose of any of said sugar so imported remaining undisposed of and to liquidate or adjust the entire transaction in such manner as may be deemed by said board to be equitable and proper in the premises.

That is followed by a provision which authorizes the board to pay to the corporation and copartnership aforesaid such sums as may be found by said board to represent the actual loss sustained by them; but that does not limit them in the way of profit. It does not limit the previous grant of power to adjust it in any way they see fit. It authorizes them to pay the actual loss, but it does not prevent their paying profits or commissions. It seems to me there should be no doubt in the premises in any event, and that it ought to be limited to the actual losses sustained and authorize them to pay the actual losses only.

Now, I want to call attention just in this connection to the assumption that has been made here all along that this is a contractual obligation. Gentlemen, if this were a contractual obligation this claim would be in the Court of Claims and not before the House of Representatives. The attorney for B. H. Howell & Co. admitted that there is no legal obligation. If we are to adopt a policy of paying moral obligations, let me call your attention to this: During the war wheat was $2.90 a bushel. The elevator men had their elevators filled with wheat for which they paid $2.90 a bushel, and the farmers had wheat worth that amount. Overnight the Government fixed the price at $2 a bushel and turned round and said to the elevator men and to the farmers, "You sell your wheat for $2 a bushel, although you paid $2.90 a bushel." The corporation made $89,000,000 in profit. There are millions of dollars in claims in the Agricultural Committee in wheat transactions. If you are going to pay moral obligations, if you adopt that as a general policy, you might as well build a new Treasury Building and get your printing presses and go to work printing the bonds.

Now, as to this proposition involved here, the board is authorized to adjust the entire transaction in such a manner as may be deemed by said board to be equitable and proper. I take it that they could award them any kind of a profit they thought was just and reasonable. It can award them any actual losses that they think was sustained by the companies. They might consider commissions and profits to be just and reasonable under the circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not know just what the purpose of the gentleman from Texas is in offering this amendment. I assume that he has no thought of endeavoring to make the House of Representatives appear ridiculous, and yet that is exactly what would be accomplished if his amendment was adopted. The resolution provides that these transactions shall be investigated, with a view to paying to the corporations such sums as are found to represent actual losses. I wonder just what that board would think if they had a measure presented to them that in one line said they should pay the sum which represented only actual losses and in another part that they were charged to pay no profits. At least, they would not have a very high regard for the intelligence of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CHAIRMAN, I do not want to charge any sinister motive to the gentleman from Texas, and I would not do that, for I am sure he is perfectly honest, though not wise in this amendment that he offers. Is it possible that somewhere between the actual losses and a denial of profits there is a sum that might be paid under this amendment? I am frank to say that offhand I can not discover that there is any space between these two propositions, but if there is any reason on earth for this amendment it would be on the theory that there is a sum somewhere between actual losses and profits, and under the amendment the Trading Co. would get the difference. So that the gentleman from Texas has offered an amendment that seems ridiculous on its face, and if it means anything at all it means that he proposes to give the Sugar Equalization Board authority to pay more than could be paid under this resolution, to wit, some uncertain sum existing between their losses and a possible profit.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment by Mr. BLANTON: At the end of the Jones amendment add the following: "Provided further, That the President shall take into consideration all other sugar holdings and profits thereon controlled by any officer connected with the corporations mentioned herein in determining any losses sustained."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. I reserve a point of order.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I make the point of order on the ground that he can not add the settlement of other claims to the one involved here.

Mr. BLANTON. It clearly deals with this general subject.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It deals with sugar, but with other sugar claims. This point, Mr. Chairman, has been decided so many times in the House—

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

Mr. BLANTON. I think it is clearly germane and a proper limitation.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is not a limitation; it provides for other sugar claims than the one under consideration. It is like an amendment to build another battleship or do other similar work which can not be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks that the amendment be again reported. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the amendment.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, what is the purpose of this resolution? It is to pay alleged losses to these two corporations, which it is alleged were agents of the Government in the sugar transaction. It is alleged that these officers by reason of the sugar transaction in connection with buying and distributing sugar in the United States suffered a loss. Now, if, as a matter of fact, these men in other sugar transactions which they simultaneously carried on made profits, why should not the President take them into consideration? It is clearly germane; it is clearly a limitation to the authorization given the President, and clearly in order under the precedents of the House.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. May I inquire whether the gentleman from Kansas made his point of order that this is not germane to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understood the gentleman.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If that is the point of order it seems to me the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is clearly a matter of entirely different transactions than the one mentioned in the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES]. It seems to me the gentleman's amendment would be germane to the resolution, but it certainly is not germane to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES]. Mr. JONES's amendment deals with the whole question whether you can take into consideration the profits.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is certainly not germane to that proposition, and since it is offered as an amendment to an amendment it must not only be germane to the resolution, but it must be germane to the particular amendment to which it is offered.

Mr. BLANTON. It just points out to the President the manner in which he shall proceed in passing upon both the resolution and the amendment offered by my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. It is very clear under the rules of the House that a specific subject may not be amended by a provision general in nature, even when of the class of the specific subject. This amendment deals with a class and the resolution deals with a specific item. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] prescribes that the money shall not be paid to these two specific claimants. Therefore, in the opinion of the Chair, this second amendment, dealing with other subjects, is not germane to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I can not agree with the distinguished floor leader when he says that the amendment of my colleague [Mr. JONES] is ridiculous and that he is unwise, that it has not any bearing on the subject. It may so appear to the floor leader, but lots of things appear to him one way and to other people differently. It has been suggested here that the Government promised these agents 2 cents per pound profit—1 cent per pound profit to the American Trading Co. for buying and 1 cent per pound profit to the distributing company for distribution. That is 2 cents per pound profit that is claimed they were to receive on this sugar transaction.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. When my colleague [Mr. JONES] proposes by his amendment that you can not consider this 2 cents per pound profit, you can not consider anything but paying back actual loss, why is it not a wise proposition? Why is it ridiculous?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Why is there not wisdom in it? What is there about it that is ridiculous, except the floor leader's effort in trying to get the amendment out of the way? The truth of the matter is that my colleague has proposed an amendment that stands in the way of these fellows getting 2 cents per pound profit.

That 1 per cent was, of course, a slip of the tongue. I meant 1 cent per pound. There is nothing in the hearings about this big lobby that has been behind this proposition since last May, and yet the lobby is here, and though we thought the proposition dead, we find now that it has been actively slumbering until the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] and his Rules Committee have brought it in once more with new life, and under the whip and lash they are going to pass it here in a few minutes. When you people go home, all of you, and face your jobbers in your districts, and face your retailers, every one of whom were caught with high-priced sugar and lost money, try to explain to them if you can why you gave two and a half million dollars to these two corporations and left them at home up in the air with the bag to hold. You can not explain it to them or to your consumers, and you are going to have trouble when you go home. You western fellows, try to explain to your sheep men and your cattle men, who when this same reaction came, were bankrupted, to the extent of 60 per cent of them. Why, there were millionaires then who are now not worth a cent. You will have to explain this proposition to them, and all of the ingenious argument that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and the distinguished floor leader put up here to whip you into line is not going to brush away that feeling of dissatisfaction. You had better think about it before you vote for this resolution.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I am not asking for time for the purpose of opposing the amendment, but I desire to correct a statement. The statement has been made that the Government should make its contracts good, and that a vote against this resolution is a vote of repudiation. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that there were no contracts. The question is, Shall we accept the statement of gentlemen who have spoken or shall we accept the statement of the Attorney General and of Mr. Figg and the claimants themselves? I desire to read from the record. Mr. PURNELL asked:

Was there anything said to you by Mr. Figg or any other representative of the Department of Justice that would lead you to believe that the Government would take care of you in case there was a loss sustained?

Mr. FRANKLIN. No, sir.

Will you accept Mr. Franklin's statement or the statement of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] or the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]? What does the Attorney General have to say? Let us see:

Mr. PURNELL. Do you know whether there was any arrangement of any kind made whereby they were to be protected against any loss.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. No, sir.

Do you accept the statement of the Attorney General or the statement of somebody else?

Here is another:

Mr. TINCER. So they were to have the same profit other men were to have in handling sugar, so far as you are able to enforce your ideas of the Lever food control law?

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. That is correct. Of course, we could not control all.

Further, Mr. Franklin was asked by the chairman:

Have you a contract with the Government guaranteeing you against loss?

Mr. FRANKLIN. No, sir.

Mr. ARMSTRONG, attorney for the claimants, stated:

At the time we undertook the purchase of these sugars no arrangement had been made for compensation for our services.

That is the statement of the attorney, the statement of the claimant, and the statement of Mr. Figg, who represented the department, and the statement of the Attorney General, and there are numerous other statements.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. ROACH. If I understood the gentleman who had the floor a moment ago, he said the Attorney General stated there was no legal liability for these claims.

Mr. HAUGEN. Absolutely.

Mr. ROACH. I call the gentleman's attention to the hearings, on page 13, to a letter from the Assistant Attorney General, signed Guy D. Goff, in which he makes this statement, and this letter is addressed to the gentleman as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture:

The Attorney General expressed the view before the committee that there was an undeniable moral obligation, and in his opinion a legal obligation upon the Government.

Mr. HAUGEN. But I have just read the statement of Attorney General Palmer.

Mr. ROACH. And I am reading the Attorney General's letter as addressed to the gentleman.

Mr. HAUGEN. I am quoting the Attorney General from his testimony before the committee.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN (reading):

The chairman asked Mr. Figg what authority did that proclamation give you to buy or to sell or to guarantee any profits?

Mr. Figg. We did not at any point have the power to guarantee against loss by that act.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the Government have any power to purchase or to guarantee against loss?

Mr. Figg. I think not; no, sir.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Right there. Is it not the fact that Attorney General Daugherty came before the committee in person?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; and I am quoting from Attorney General Palmer.

Mr. KINCHELOE. And at first he thought probably there was a good legal claim, but before he got through and after considering it thoroughly he felt that there was no legal obligation, and he did not know whether there was any moral obligation.

Mr. ASWELL. He never said there was no moral obligation.

Mr. HAUGEN. The attorney for the Sugar Equalization Board, Mr. Glasgow, stated that in his judgment there is no legal obligation anywhere though there may be a moral obligation.

Mr. ASWELL. Does not the gentleman believe that a moral obligation of the Government is more binding than a legal obligation?

Mr. HAUGEN. I arose to correct a statement made that a contract was entered into.

Mr. ASWELL. And if the Government does not pay its moral obligations—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer, but before that I ask that the pending amendment may be disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman in time after the disposition of this amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, debate is closed at the end of 10 minutes, 5 minutes of that time being reserved for the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thought there had been no arrangement made.

Mr. MONDELL. I made the statement on the floor that the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Indiana desired to speak in those 10 minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Can the gentleman from Indiana get along with three minutes?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will try to do that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think we ought to dispose of the pending amendment.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I want to speak on the pending amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Indiana is entitled to time to close discussion. So far the negative has had no opportunity to discuss this amendment. Discussion so far has been all in favor of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the best way he can solve this question is to allow the gentleman from Indiana to speak for three minutes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, of course the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is not going to adopt the Jones amendment. The Jones amendment is made by a gentleman who is opposed to any of this legislation, and this committee, which favors the legislation, is not going in the last minute to adopt an amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] which would confuse the whole issue, because the bill in itself makes this provision, and it absolutely safeguards every interest the gentleman mentions, in that it says:

To liquidate and adjust the entire transaction in such manner as may be deemed by said board to be equitable and proper in the premises.

So the Jones amendment would just confuse the whole issue, and this resolution ought to be passed in its present form, because we are in the closing days of the Congress and we ought not to compel this joint resolution to be taken back to another body.

This resolution ought to be passed. Anyone who has carefully read the hearings must be convinced that there is a moral obligation on the part of the Government of the United States to see that the board adjusts this claim. Of course, there is no legal obligation. If there were, gentlemen need not be here with this measure. It is a moral obligation to provide not for the payment out of the Treasury, but out of the funds of the Sugar Equalization Board made by the sugar transactions, and it does not come out of the Treasury at all. It is a moral obligation of the United States. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] says we can not go back and face our constituents if we meet this moral obligation of the United States. I do not know what kind of constituents the gentleman has in his district, but I prefer to go back and meet my constituents and say to them that in the aftermath of the great war a Republican administration which succeeded a Democratic administration undertook to carry out the obligations which the officers of that Democratic administration made during that war, and we did not stop to quibble as to whether we are absolutely bound legally to do it or not, but we inquired to see if it was a moral obligation made by those agents of Democratic administration conducting this great war, and when we found it was such an obligation we decided promptly to meet it. So, gentlemen, I think we ought promptly to vote down the Jones amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the yeas appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. JONES of Texas) there were—ayes 56, yeas 117.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 12, after the word "transaction," insert "if it shall appear to said board that such loss constituted an equitable and proper claim against the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of offering this amendment is to clarify what possibly might be construed as an ambiguity in the power given to this board.

You will observe by the reading of the language that the board shall have the power "to liquidate and adjust the entire transaction in such manner as may be deemed by said board to be equitable and proper in the premises, paying to the corporation and copartnership aforesaid such sums as may be found by said board to represent the actual loss sustained by them."

I do not know but that, by the ordinary rules of interpretation, that might be construed as a mandatory provision authorizing them to pay such actual loss as they may find they sustained, whether or not the board determined it was an equitable and just claim against the Government. The language suggested, of course, can do no damage to the spirit and purpose of the resolution as it has been framed; but it seems to me it ought to be clearly inserted in the language of the provision that this shall be paid only in the event that the board, after its investigation, shall as a matter of fact find that it constitutes a just and equitable claim.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is not the gentleman's amendment contained in line 10?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Line 9.

Mr. FESS. Is not the wording in lines 9 and 10 the same as the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It says the adjustment shall be equitable and proper; but it may be construed as requiring them to pay the loss, regardless of whether they find it to be equitable and proper or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 2, line 18, after the word "resolution," insert the following proviso: "Provided, That as a condition precedent to the taking over by the Sugar Equalization Board of such transaction, said B. H. Howell, Son & Co. shall be required to turn over to the said Sugar Equalization Board 10 per cent of all profits made by it on other sugar importations between the 13th day of May and the 13th day of July, 1920."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 2, line 18, after the word "resolution," insert the following proviso: "Provided, That the amount of losses, if any, which the Sugar Equalization Board is hereby authorized to pay such companies, or either of them, shall be reduced by the amount of profits which said companies, or either of them, made on sugar imported by the companies, or either of them, between May 22 and August 21, 1920."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division on that.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 115.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WARD of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the resolution back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have a preferential motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers a preferential motion, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 2, line 11, after the word "loss," insert "exclusive of profits."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] moves that the committee do now rise and report the resolution to the House with the recommendation that it do pass. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration Senate Joint Resolution 12 authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar

Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 13,902 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic, had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that the resolution do pass.

The SPEAKER. By the rule the previous question is considered as ordered.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the enacting clause. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That is not in order. The rule provides that it shall be considered without intervening motion. The previous question is ordered. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. JONES of Texas moves to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Agriculture with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment:

"Provided, That the United States Sugar Equalization Board shall not pay anything in the way of profits to the American Trading Co. or to B. H. Howell, Son & Co. in such transaction."

Mr. WARD of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit. The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks for the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirty-eight Members rising. The Chair will count the number present. [After counting.] Two hundred and nineteen Members present. Not a sufficient number rising to second the demand. The yeas and nays are refused. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 181, nays 124, not voting 122, as follows:

Mr. Cooper of Ohio with Mr. Byrns of Tennessee.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I was not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not qualify under the rule.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. WARD of New York, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

P. DE RONDE & CO. (INC.).

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. J. Res. 79, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hicks] will resume the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. Hicks in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over from the corporation P. DeRonde & Co. (Inc.) a certain transaction entered into and carried on by said corporation at the request and under the direction of the Department of Justice, which transaction involved the purchase in the Argentine Republic, between the 15th day of June, 1920, and the 22d day of June, 1920, of 5,000 tons of sugar, the importation thereof into the United States and the distribution of a portion of the same within the United States, and to require the said United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to dispense of any of said sugar so imported remaining undisposed of and to liquidate and adjust the entire transaction, paying to the corporation aforesaid such sum as may be found by said board to represent the actual loss sustained by them in said transaction, and for this purpose the President is authorized to vote or use the stock of the corporation held by him, or otherwise exercise or use his control over the said United States Sugar Equalization Board and its directors, and to continue the said corporation for such time as may be necessary to carry out the intention of this joint resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, under the rule for the division of time, will recognize in favor of the resolution the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL] and opposed to the resolution the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE].

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the same principle is involved in this bill that is involved in the bill which has just passed. You are all familiar with the fact that the Sugar Equalization Board, which was analogous to the Grain Corporation, was created for the purpose of assuring to the people of the country an adequate supply of sugar. That stock was held by the President of the United States. That board made a profit of $39,000,000. Thirty million dollars of that profit was covered into the Treasury of the United States. The $9,000,000 remaining, which has been increased to about $10,000,000, is now held, together with the capital stock, in the treasury of the Sugar Equalization Board for the specific purpose, as stated to us by the Sugar Equalization Board, to take care of odds and ends and such claims as this.

Back in April, 1920, it became very evident to the Department of Justice, to the Attorney General, to whom had been given the powers and duties that were theretofore held by the Food Administrator, that there was a shortage of sugar in the country, or at least that there was a corner in sugar. It became necessary to take some drastic steps to break that corner to protect the consumers of the country. In the debate which has just preceded this you have learned how the Department of Justice, through the Department of State, secured by means of diplomatic channels the raising of the embargo that existed in Argentina against the exportation of sugar. That was in April, 1920. In May, 1920, just one month later, Mr. A. W. Riley, who was the special agent of the Department of Justice in these sugar matters, stationed in New York City, called together a number of importers of New York City and stated to them the purposes of the Department of Justice in securing an adequate supply of sugar.

Among those concerned who were importuned to bring sugar into the United States under this plan of the Department of Justice was the firm of P. De Ronde & Co. The corporation of P. De Ronde & Co. had not at any time been interested in the importation of sugar. They were shippers. Their ships traveled between the Argentine Republic and the United States of America. Mr. De Ronde, a splendid young gentleman, who served his country during the war in France, who is president of that company, came before our committee and said that he had no knowledge about sugar prior to the interview with the representative of the Department of Justice, but that he considered the matter and finally concluded to undertake the task of bringing into the country 5,000 tons of Argentine sugar. The department asked him to bring in any amount that he could bring. De Ronde had at that time a ship that was partially loaded at Argentina. De Ronde testified that after he made this arrangement, after he had undertaken to help his Government at the request of the department agent, he cabled to the Argentine Republic and had the ship unloaded of its cargo and had the agent in Argentina buy with his money 5,000 tons of this sugar, for which he paid 19½ cents a pound. That sugar was loaded on this vessel and brought back to the United States.

Now, you are familiar with the story up to that time. When it was announced through the public press, which announcement was greatly exaggerated, that the Government of the United States intended to break the back of this sugar combination and bring down the price of sugar by going into Argentina and buying it and selling it to American consumers, the price naturally dropped. The report that was carried in the press was exaggerated. It said that the United States Government was going to buy from 64,000 to 140,000 tons of this sugar, so that when De Ronde brought his sugar into the United States he was subject to the same conditions that confronted the American Trading Co. when they attempted to bring back the 13,000 tons.

At the time he entered into the negotiations with Rily, who was the duly authorized and acting agent, as Attorney General Palmer said in his testimony, of the Department of Justice, he was given distinctly to understand that he would be confined in his profits to 1 cent per pound, and when he brought the sugar back to the United States he must distribute it to the persons, firms, or corporations, and through the channels designated by the Department of Justice. He had no other opportunity than this; they were to furnish a list of the customers. Upon the arrival of the sugar in New York City it was impossible for the Department of Justice to furnish a list of the customers, because the price had fallen by virtue of this wholesale purchase and the exaggerated report in the newspapers. The bottom had fallen out of the sugar market and the American consumers had been saved hundreds of millions of dollars.

Gentlemen, this claim is on the same footing and the same basis as the other claim, and if we are in peace time to recognize obligations made by our predecessors during the war, certainly we are bound morally if not legally to pay this claim. Now, I do not want any member of the committee to be confused about the procedure that will follow after the adoption of this resolution. We are merely authorizing the President to instruct the Sugar Equalization Board that has this $10,000,000 profit made out of sugar to pay such losses as may be legally found to be due these people.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. I prefer not to yield as I have only a few minutes. The Committee on Agriculture has given to this claim the most careful scrutiny. I signed, at first, the minority report as I was opposed to it.

I was opposed to these sugar claims until we sent a special subcommittee, composed of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN], the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JACOWAY], and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHE], down to the Department of State and to the Department of Justice, where they were permitted to see the secret communications that passed between our diplomats in the Argentine and the State Department, and upon their statements and upon the documents which I saw I became absolutely convinced that these transactions were brought about at the instigation and request of the Government, and that these men at all times were under the jurisdiction of the Government, and, therefore, that the claims ought to be allowed. [Applause.]

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, as I stated to the committee in the speech I made against the other claim, in my judgment this is more meritorious as a claim than the one just passed, by a good deal. There was no smoke screen put up. They bought the sugar and complied with the Argentine regulations. The reason they lost is because they entered into a contract so much later than the American Trading Co. and Howell & Co., and they exercised all of the diligence they could, and got the sugar here. I am against all of these claims, and you gentlemen now have an opportunity to vote $1,170,000 more out of the Treasury, and I presume you are going to do it. I am going to vote against it, but, as I say, I think this is a more meritorious claim than the other one. I do not want to be understood as saying that I am for it, or that I am mitigating the objections that lie against this claim.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. How many of this character of claims are pending in Congress?

Mr. KINCHELOE. The American Trading Co., the claim just passed, appropriates $2,250,000, about, and this appropriates about $1,170,000 more. The Lamborn claim has not yet been reported out from the committee, but it appropriates $750,000, and there are several other claims. I do not know how many will come in, now that the head has been knocked out of the barrel.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Is it proposed that we indemnify all of these fellows who lost money on these sugar transactions?

Mr. KINCHELOE. The majority of the House seem to indicate that that is true. I do not.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. I think I understood the gentleman to say, or some gentleman to say, that there are a lot of claims for losses on wheat.

Mr. KINCHELOE. There is a bill pending before the Agricultural Committee to reimburse men for millions of dollars who bought up wheat and afterwards the Government put the price on it and who lost.

Mr. FIELDS. So that we do not know where this will stop?

Mr. KINCHELOE. No; now that the precedent has been set.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. There are hundreds and thousands of claims here. I am informed, on behalf of individuals, men, women, and children, who have been injured in some way, that are now pending here before Congress. Will the gentleman explain why it is that this particular claim is given preference above all of these others?

Mr. KINCHELOE. No; I could not explain the action of the majority of the House. They are not before our committee, and I am not acquainted with those claims. So I say, so far as I am concerned, I submit to the majority of the House—[cries of "Vote!"]—but as I say, I am not mitigating this claim. I think they are all just a swoop on the Treasury, and being against the claim I am going to yield to some of these gentlemen who are also against these claims.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In the gentleman's opinion, after investigation of the facts in this particular claim, does the gentleman believe that this claimant was induced to take this action to his loss by representations or at the request of an authorized agent of the Government?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Absolutely. Mr. Rily was just as much a representative of the Department of Justice as was Mr. Figg, and the gentleman to whom all the sugar activities were turned over afterwards was Mr. Rily, whose headquarters were in New York, representing the Department of Justice.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And this man acted on the suggestion of Mr. Rily?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In unloading a ship and in going to bring the sugar to the United States?

Mr. KINCHELOE. That is the testimony.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Was Mr. Rily at that time an authorized agent of the Government to induce him to do that thing?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I do not know. He was a member of the Department of Justice with headquarters in New York, and I will say that after all of the activities of this sugar loading and unloading were turned over to Mr. Rily, the testimony shows that Mr. Rily went to Mr. Franklin of the American Trading Co. to get his activities and to learn what they were doing, and Mr. Franklin refused to report to Mr. Rily, and reported to Mr. Figg.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. In the claim just disposed of I understand that one of the beneficiaries was a large purchaser and distributor.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes. Mr. Post, of B. H. Howell & Co., was one of the biggest in the country.

Mr. OLIVER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL], who has just spoken, called attention to the fact that there was a corner on sugar during the year 1920. I am wondering if the investigation of the committee at any time led them to make special inquiry into whether either of the beneficiaries, under the claims just favorably voted on, could in any wise have been a party to such corner on sugar?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Post admitted on cross-examination before the committee that his other 14 companies, or a part of them, were busy getting it and selling raw sugar at 21 cents a pound.

Mr. OLIVER. So Mr. Post was interested in 14 other companies?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes, sir.

Mr. OLIVER. They were not only selling in this country but raising sugar elsewhere and importing it here?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Oh, yes; Cuba, Java, and the Argentine. He was connected with 14 companies.

Mr. OLIVER. His were among the largest sugar-distributing companies in America, were they not?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes. I think Mr. Post has the largest connection with sugar companies of any man in the United States.

Mr. OLIVER. Is the gentleman aware of the further fact—and I believe the gentleman called attention to it—that a number of suits have been brought by these large companies against merchants and wholesalers and retailers who purchased sugar in 1920 from them, during the months of June and July, 1920, on solicitation and assurance by these companies that there was a scarcity of sugar, that written contracts were made for future deliveries on the strength of such assurances, that many of these cases are undisposed of, and that the defense to such suits will be that these very parties, who are beneficiaries under the claim allowed, had knowledge of this cornering of sugar, and one of them may have been a party to it, yet failed to disclose the fact that there was in truth no real scarcity of sugar, but only a pretended scarcity?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I understand that is the defense. Not only that but the wholesale sugar dealers throughout the country are dependent upon this man Post and the companies in which he is interested, and are sending in propaganda by way of telegrams because they can not get more sugar from these fellows unless they support the bill just passed.

Mr. ASWELL. I desire to say that the resolution already passed in no way affects the De Ronde claim. The gentleman whose claim the House is now considering has nothing to do with the sugar business, never handled a pound of sugar before or since.

Mr. KINCHELOE. No; De Ronde bought this sugar delivered at New York and he had no idea—

Mr. ASWELL. The ship was half loaded with freight, and he unloaded at request. He is not and was not a sugar dealer at all.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The testimony shows that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is the question I asked, because I am seeking light on this proposition. I asked if this action was taken by De Ronde on the request of an authorization?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I answered that Mr. Rily, who is identified with the Department of Justice the same as Mr. Figg was with the business of the American Trading Co. and Howell & Co., except that Rily had his headquarters at New York—

Mr. BANKHEAD. He was the authorized agent of the department?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Absolutely so. To such an extent that later on all the sugar activities here were turned over to Rily instead of Figg.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will permit, I have looked through the hearings and read the report, and I have not found anywhere where either the Department of Justice or the Secretary of State or other departments indorsed the payment of this.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I do not know about that. But De Ronde did not set up a smoke screen that he was an agent of the Government, like the other claim, and in my opinion this claim is more just and equitable.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I will.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Something was said here this afternoon, probably more than once, about the Wilson administration being committed to the payment of these sugar claims. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not recall—I am not indorsing the attitude of the Wilson administration on this particular claim or any of these claims—that Mr. Wilson wrote a letter or sent a message to the Congress during the war in which he said with regard to the sugar lobby or sugar claims or these sugar bills, as he termed it, they had become a national scandal, or a public scandal?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I think that is true, but—

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. I am against both of these bills.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Palmer knew personally nothing about it except what Rily and Figg told him, and Daugherty knew absolutely nothing except what was told him. They did not have half as much knowledge as gentlemen on the floor of the House.

Mr. PURNELL. If the gentleman will yield just a minute, it must not be lost sight of that after all we are dealing with a moral obligation and not with a strictly legal obligation.

Mr. KINCHELOE. We are not dealing with a legal and I do not think a moral obligation.

Mr. PURNELL. The gentleman will remember that there is in the record a letter which Attorney General Palmer sent to Senator Moses, in which he makes this statement:

The situation with reference to sugar was by my direction placed entirely in the hands of Mr. Rily in the spring of 1920, and it became his duty to direct all the activities of the department looking to the enforcement of the Lever law with relation to sugar and to relieve the people from the high prices then prevailing.

Then later he said that while he was not personally in touch at the time with what Mr. Rily did in getting Mr. De Ronde to go to Argentina and bring in this sugar, yet what he did—

Was very clearly within his authority and jurisdiction.

And he said:

Therefore I am sure that if I had been advised at the time of the details of these transactions on the part of both Mr. Rily and Mr. Figg, I would have approved them as being in line with my instructions to use proper effort to secure the importation of such sugar with the idea of breaking the price in this country.

Mr. KINCHELOE. That is true; and that is the same Mr. Rily that Mr. Franklin would not do business with.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 13 minutes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I reserve the balance of my time, and yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN].

Mr. PURNELL. How much time have I consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Hicks, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration Senate Joint Resolution 79, authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 5,000 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic, had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Hicks], Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having under consideration the Senate Joint Resolution 79, reports that that committee has come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to close debate on the pending resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that debate on the pending resolution be now closed.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. And on that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] It is very clear that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to close debate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order on the motion to close debate, on the ground that the House has heretofore—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has made the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I withdraw that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I call for a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 44, yeas 85.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I ask for tellers, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky demands tellers. As many as favor taking this vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Twenty-two gentlemen have risen—not a sufficient number. Tellers are refused.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin demands the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn. As many as favor taking this vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Twenty-four gentlemen have risen in the affirmative—not a sufficient number.

Mr. STAFFORD. What was the vote, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Twenty-four. The yeas and nays are refused. The gentleman from Wisconsin made the point that there is no quorum present. It is quite clear that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in the absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. MONDELL. I made a motion to limit debate on the resolution before the point of order was made. Is the vote on that motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not recall if there was a division on that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Before the yeas and nays were called for a point of order was made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] that no quorum was present. Then I made a point of order on the motion to close debate, and later I called for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that there was no division on that. Therefore it is not an automatic call.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 250 Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to close debate on the pending resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to close debate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order, for the reason that the House under a rule heretofore submitted by the Committee on Rules has fixed the time for which general debate shall be in order in the consideration of this resolution. Many Members might have voted as I did, for the adoption of that rule, in the expectation that there would be an hour and a half of time given for the consideration of the resolution, half to be controlled by those in favor and half by those opposed. Now, the only way in which this House can change that order is by another rule. I believe a motion to reconsider does not lie against votes of the House on motions from the Committee on Rules. The House by its action having decided on a certain rule, namely, that there should be an hour and a half of general debate, it is not within the province of any Member to come in the House and try to alter that rule by restricting it any more than a Member would have the right to come in here now with the previous question ordered under the rule and move that the previous question should not be considered as ordered. Only the Committee on Rules has the right to make that privileged motion to change the time already fixed by the House in adopting the report of the Committee on Rules. I demand the regular order, and the regular order under the rule is to go back into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Is not the provision of the rule that there shall be "not to exceed" an hour and a half, rather than to fix an hour and a half?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not to exceed a certain stated time has always been considered that if Members did not wish to avail themselves of the time it would not have to be used; but in this instance the time was desired to be used.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, my understanding of the English language is that the phrase "not to exceed" means not any greater amount.

Mr. STAFFORD. But it was not to exceed that time in Committee of the Whole. It was not to be by further action of the House, but the order of procedure was fixed for the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. We sought to fix the outside limit.

Mr. STAFFORD. We fixed an established order that could not be exceeded in the committee. It was a rule for the procedure in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Wisconsin any authority to support his position?

Mr. STAFFORD. I can cite the Speaker to the authority for the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rules, that it is the only body which has jurisdiction to present rules of procedure. Never before have I seen any such procedure as this; and if the Chair is going to hold that after a solemn order of the House has been made that there shall be not to exceed an hour and a half of debate in committee, the committee after a minute's debate can rise without any notice as to the purpose of the committee in rising and some Member may make a motion which will supersede the province of the Committee on Rules in determining the rules of the House, it seems to me that will be an unheard-of order of procedure and a new precedent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the argument of the gentleman would undoubtedly be correct if the resolution had fixed definitely a certain time; but as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] has pointed out, the resolution says that there shall be not to exceed 1 hour and 30 minutes of general debate. Now, there is a general rule, of course, that the House at any time has the right to close debate in Committee of the Whole. The Chair does not think, because the Committee on Rules said there should be not to exceed an hour and a half, that that takes away from the House the power to decide whether there shall be less than that. It does not give it to any one gentleman to decide, but it leaves it in the power of the House to decide whether there shall be less than that time for general debate. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to close debate.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Should not the motion to go into Committee of the Whole be made before the gentleman moves to close debate?

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the House will automatically go into Committee of the Whole. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that debate in Committee of the Whole be now closed.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 125, noes 43.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Pending the count—

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Kentucky withhold his point for a moment?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I suggest to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] that I think at the time the rule was adopted the House felt that there would be an hour and a half of discussion upon this particular bill, and while I think there is no question about the correctness of the Speaker's ruling that the House has the right to close the debate, yet it seems to me it would save time if the gentleman from Wyoming would ask unanimous consent to have the order vacated by which debate was closed or appeared to be closed and let the rest of the time be taken up in the debate.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, personally I should have been perfectly willing to have the debate go on for an hour and a half, but the gentlemen in control on both sides, after discussing the matter, had agreed that, so far as they were concerned, they were perfectly willing to close the debate at the close of the statements which they should make. Both gentlemen reserved the remainder of their time, and under those circumstances it has been the almost invariable rule of the House for the Clerk to begin to read the bill. In making the motion to close debate I was carrying out what I understood to be the desire of gentlemen on both sides. Both of the gentlemen stated that this claim was in very large measure similar to the one just settled, and that, therefore, there was no reason for any extended general debate, but that proposed amendments could be debated under the five-minute rule.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The gentleman misunderstood my statement if he understood me to say what he says. I said that, so far as I was personally concerned, I thought this was more meritorious than the other bill, but that if any gentleman opposed to the bill wanted time, I proposed to give it to him, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] was desiring recognition.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] reserved his time and the gentleman favoring the bill reserved his time, and under the ordinary practice of the House that closed the debate.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I had yielded 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] when the gentleman moved to rise.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I did not know the gentleman had yielded time to the gentleman from Michigan. If I had, I would not have moved to close debate. If there are other gentlemen who wish to debate, I think they ought to be heard. I suggest that we have 20 minutes additional general debate to be divided equally among those for and against the measure.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that an additional 20 minutes of general debate be had, to be equally divided among those for and those against the measure.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Reserving the right to object, I want to say that as far as I am concerned I have no interest in the bill, but they came in and gave us scarcely no time under the rule, and after debate under the gag rule the majority leader comes in and undertakes to cut off debate.

Mr. MONDELL. As I understood the matter, the gentleman from Kentucky, who has just spoken, agreed that so far as he was concerned general debate might be closed.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I did not agree to that. I said positively that I proposed to yield time to those against the bill, and I had yielded 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] when the motion was made that the committee rise. The RECORD will show that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. HERRICK. I object.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it, and the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming to close debate prevails. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from New York will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. Hicks in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 79) authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 5,000 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic.

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over from the corporation P. DeRonde & Co. (Inc.) a certain transaction entered into and carried on by said corporation at the request and under the direction of the Department of Justice, which transaction involved the purchase in the Argentine Republic, between the 15th day of June, 1920, and the 22d day of June, 1920, of 5,000 tons of sugar, the importation thereof into the United States and the distribution of a portion of the same within the United States, and to require the said United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to dispose of any of said sugar so imported remaining undisposed of and to liquidate and adjust the entire transaction, paying to the corporation aforesaid such sum as may be found by said board to represent the actual loss sustained by them in said transaction, and for this purpose the President is authorized to vote or use the stock of the corporation held by him, or otherwise exercise or use his control over the said United States Sugar Equalization Board and its directors, and to continue the said corporation for such time as may be necessary to carry out the intention of this joint resolution.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan may continue for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HERRICK. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not recognize any Member who does not stand up and address the Chair. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I object.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, a few minutes ago the House passed a resolution providing for the consideration of the claim of the American Trading Co. and B. H. Howell & Co. by the Sugar Equalization Board. I was strongly in favor of that resolution and so expressed myself. It has been said by those who have spoken on this resolution relating to the De Ronde claim that it is entirely like the American Trading Co. claim. One gentleman went so far as to say he thinks this claim has more merit than the others. I am not able to agree with him. I think the two claims are dissimilar. The fact that they relate to sugar, the fact that the sugar imported was from Argentina are the only respects in which the two claims are alike. I insist that this De Ronde Co. was exactly in the position of thousands of others throughout the country—farmers, manufacturers, and producers of all kinds—receiving, acting upon, and responding to the requests of the Government for increased production. In doing so each took his chances. There was no guaranty against loss; there was nothing said and no circumstances in any way, even remotely, connected with it that would suggest a guaranty. There was no employment, no creating of an agency as there was in the case that we have just concluded.

It is true that Mr. Rily, representing the Department of Justice, asked the De Ronde Co. to bring sugar from Argentina. It is true as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL] says, that Rily had certain authority. There may be some difference of opinion as to what his authority was. I do not know that he exceeded his authority in any case.

I presume Attorney General Palmer was right in saying that Rily acted properly in these matters and that if the Attorney General had known of them he would have approved them. What was Rily's authority, and how did he exercise that authority? He had authority over the sugar situation, to do what was in his power to increase the supply and induce those who were able to bring sugar into the United States. In pursuance of that he asked, among others, the De Ronde Co. to bring in sugar. Now, I wish to read some of the hearings, and I want you to judge. I think you will come to the conclusion that I reached, that it was simply a request on the part of Mr. Rily, a very mild one indeed, that might have been complied with or not, just as De Ronde wished. Mr. De Ronde says—and this involves a couple of million dollars, and it is worth while to give a little time to it. I wish I might have discussed it under general debate where the time was not so limited. It may be that you will be generous if I take a little more time in reading what may seem to be too long an extract from the hearings, but it is important and bears directly on the matter I am speaking of:

It was in May of last year, 1920, that the subject of sugar importations from the Argentine was first discussed between Mr. Rily, of the Department of Justice, and myself in New York. I saw him frequently in New York. Sometimes I discussed matters of business with him—his coal work at times and his sugar work—and at other times I simply exchanged the courtesies of the day with him. It was toward the end of May when he informed me that through the efforts of his own department, the Department of Justice, and the Department of State, the embargo which up to that time prevailed upon exports of Argentine sugar was lifted or was about to be lifted; that if that was the case, and knowing that I was interested in Argentine affairs, and had been for a good many years, he desired to know whether I would not interest myself in such an importation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Michigan be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I am sorry that I can not agree with my distinguished colleague from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN]. Usually I follow him, because I have great respect for his ability and integrity. I followed him on the other claim. I filed a minority report against the other claim, but when he and the other members of the subcommittee came back from the Department of Justice and the Department of State and assured me, as they did the other members of the committee, that that transaction was at all times under the jurisdiction of the Government, I followed him. I am unable to see the difference between these two claims. When the Department of Justice took over the Food Administration and became responsible for the distribution of sugar in the country, they set out in April, 1920, to find sugar with which to break the market. They made an agreement with the American Trading Co. to go down into the Argentine and bring back some 60,000 tons of that sugar. About that time, according to the testimony of Attorney General Palmer, he put Mr. A. W. Rily in charge of the office in New York City, with what he designated as full authority to act. Mr. Rily, acting on that authority, called together a number of the importers in New York City, explained the existence of this sugar in the Argentine, and suggested the advisability of bringing it back to the United States for the purpose of breaking the market. Mr. De Ronde considered the proposition a number of times, as he states in his testimony, because he was not a sugar man but a shipper. He finally consented to undertake it, but upon what terms? Upon these conditions: First, that he should be limited to 1 cent profit per pound; second, that the Department of Justice would furnish to him a list of those to whom the sugar was to be distributed. Mr. De Ronde stated in his testimony—it is undisputed—that he was not a sugar man and had no facilities for distributing sugar.

The American Trading Co. had joined hands with B. F. Howell & Co., sugar people, who had the facilities for distribution. De Ronde specifically stated in his testimony that at the time of the negotiations with Mr. Rily, representing the Department of Justice, he was not so much concerned about the 1 cent profit as he was about distributing it after he got it back here. I can not at this moment lay my hand upon exactly what Mr. Rily said, but in substance it was this, that the Department of Justice was being besieged every day, that life was being made almost unbearable by reason of the fact that thousands were soliciting them to furnish sugar, and that Mr. De Ronde would have no trouble in finding purchasers, and that they would guarantee that. It was upon those conditions that Mr. De Ronde entered into these arrangements, brought the sugar back, and found when he returned that there were no persons to whom it could be distributed. He also stated at the same time, when the suggestion was made that he could take it back to the Argentine and sell it at a profit, or at least save his face, that the Government would not permit it, and I submit to the House that if that is not as much supervision as was exercised in the other case, then I am not able to make a distinction. Here is the difference between the two cases. The American Trading Co. blazed the trail. They were the first ones to get in touch with the Department of Justice, and naturally their name was linked up with those cablegrams that went from this Government to the Argentine, but does anybody deny that these two companies set about to do the same thing, and that they did the same thing? I am sorry that I can not agree with the distinguished gentleman from Michigan. He is usually right, but in this he is decidedly but honestly wrong.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer as a substitute to strike out the period and insert a colon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 2, line 14, strike out the period and insert a colon.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, in the Sixty-seventh Congress through deaths and resignations the House of Representatives lost some of its most valuable Members. One of the greatest losses that it has sustained, in my judgment, is the loss of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Walsh, whose presence is needed here in this House every day, and whose absence we will not get over for a long time.

In the closing hours of the Sixty-sixth Congress, when there were assaults made with war claim after claim to take large sums of money out of the Treasury, the conscience of Joe Walsh was shocked to such an extent that he got on this floor and accused his colleagues of having broken down the Treasury doors, so many were the different large sums that were being taken out. I imagine if he were here now on just such claims as these, one for $2,500,000, which we have just passed, and the one now under consideration for $1,700,000, he would stand as leading a solid phalanx against such raids upon the people's Treasury. I wish he were back, and I wish there were more like him to stand up here and keep the money in the Treasury, where it belongs. If you take this sum out, you can take sums out with equal propriety on hundreds or even thousands of similar claims.

I wish we had time to go into them. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] has not been given time. We have been whipped into line here. It is now 10 minutes to 6 o'clock; it is after quitting time, and yet debate is cut off and we are forced to vote here with hardly any consideration whatever being given to this measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois and Mr. THORPE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture I gave very careful consideration to the evidence submitted in these sugar claims. I came to a conclusion directly opposite to that expressed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN]. We must appreciate the fact that in the consideration of these claims we are not considering legal claims against the Government, although Attorney General Daugherty did express the view before our committee that those were legal claims. I came to the conclusion from the testimony that the Congress should not recognize and should not pay these claims, not because it was not a contract between these parties and authorized representatives of the Government but because if we start on the payment of moral obligations growing out of the Great War there would be no place where Congress could stop. The Committee on Agriculture, the Committee on Rules, and the House by a very large majority on the roll call voted a short while ago expressed the view that these claims should be liquidated by the Government. In my opinion, the claim we are now considering has a great deal more moral weight than the claim just passed. I voted against the rule. I voted against the claim just considered, because I wanted to be consistent and did not want to take up these claims. But here is what we have in this matter: De Ronde & Co. were not sugar men. They had no transactions in sugar; they had no experience in sugar. They were shipowners operating a line of ships between the ports of this country and South American ports. A representative of the Department of Justice, whom the Attorney General, Mitchell Palmer, said had authority to act for the department, entered into an arrangement with De Ronde & Co. to load one of their ships then in the harbor at Buenos Aires with sugar for the port of New York and agreed that the Department of Justice would furnish buyers for that sugar at a profit of 1 cent a pound.

Remember, this ship that brought the sugar here was half loaded with merchandise to be transported to this country, but at the request of the Department of Justice under this contract and this agreement that cargo was unloaded and a cargo of sugar was brought to New York. When it arrived there, as has been explained, the market broke, and the agents of the Department of Justice who made this contract with De Ronde & Co., could not find purchasers for the sugar and they suffered loss. In my opinion it would be a monstrosity if the Congress of the United States should liquidate a claim that has just been allowed, where the record shows that Mr. Post, one of those interested in the Howell company, was a large dealer in sugar—as I say, to liquidate their claim and then turn down a claim exactly similar when the parties who were in the steamship business, acting as agents of the Government, loaded one of their ships after unloading their cargo in order to bring the sugar into this country. That is the reason I intend to vote for this claim. Congress has already gone on record as saying these contracts entered into by the Department of Justice to break the price of sugar shall be considered as moral obligations against the Government and should be paid out of profits made out of sugar by the Sugar Equalization Board. I shall vote for this claim because, against my vote and my judgment, Congress has already said claims of this kind should be paid. I see no reason to discriminate against these claimants.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I rise in opposition to the motion of the gentleman. A few minutes ago I was reading from the testimony of Mr. De Ronde. To continue, Mr. De Ronde said:

I was not particularly keen about it at the time, never having been in the sugar business and knowing very little about it.

I will not read it all, but he goes on to say he would take this under advisement and think it over and look into it as a business proposition; he came to the conclusion from the standpoint of his own interests that it was safe and right for him to go into it, and he decided to do it. He gave instructions to his company in Argentina to buy 5,000 tons of sugar, which was loaded. Before it left Argentina the price had begun to drop, and he talked with Mr. Rily about selling it there. Mr. Rily did not exercise any authority over him or issue any orders to him; he did not command him, but he said, "No, you must not do that, you promised to bring that here and should keep your promise," evidencing that he had no control over Mr. De Ronde whatever. Mr. Rily said to him that this slump in price was only temporary, that the price is going to increase. Practically, as he said himself, "I went back and thought it over and decided that Rily was right." I said to myself, "I guess the thing is going to be all right after all." He acted on his own judgment and brought that sugar on. Then when the boat was half way between Argentina and New York he talked with Rily again about the matter, and Rily urged him to let the ship come on. Mr. De Ronde was asked by the chairman of our committee if he could have interfered and turned the ship back to Argentina. He said, "Oh, yes; possibly so; possibly I could; we are always in touch with our vessels by wireless." He might have sent his ship back and sold the sugar. He was free to use his own judgment. He was not in the position of the American Trading Co. The Government itself had been handling the Trading Co. matter, and it was under obligations to the Government of Argentina. Our Government had pledged the matter as its own. It could not sell.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. I wish to ask in regard to this claim now under consideration whether the present Attorney General has regarded it as both legally and morally binding?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. He did not know anything about it; anybody listening to him would be satisfied that he did not know a blooming thing about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. COPLEY. What did he say?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. He said he thought there was a moral obligation and perhaps a legal obligation. I read a letter written by an Assistant Attorney General in which one of these sugar claimants is described as "agent of the Department of Justice." I went to him and asked him what authority he had for using those words. He said, "Those words are used in the resolution presented to the House"—that is, they were the words of the claimant himself. I asked him if he had made any inquiry or investigation about the thing. He did not know as much as the Attorney General, and that is going some. So much for those expressions of opinion as to the force and legality of these claims.

Now, it is said that the Department of Justice was to control the distribution of the De Ronde sugar. It was to control the distribution no more than it controlled the distribution of many, many other food products in the United States, directing when and where and at what price they should be sold. They were to exercise general supervision over it and limit the price as they limited the price on dozens of articles. I said from the first that Mr. De Ronde and his company simply brought themselves into line with thousands of producers in this country, and that they were not entitled to any more consideration than is any one of these thousands of producers.

Now, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL] says he did not agree with me as to the merits of the American Trading Co.'s claim at first, but when he went to the Department of State and looked over the correspondence he was convinced as to that claim and also as to the justice of this De Ronde claim. I would like to ask him where he found one line, one word, in the office of the Secretary of State in regard to this claim. They answered expressly and concisely when asked about sugar claims, "The American Trading Co.'s claim is the only one we have ever had anything to do with." There is not a line in that department in regard to De Ronde's claim or the De Ronde transaction from first to last.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. COCKRAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to this debate with considerable interest. I knew nothing about these claims until I began to examine this morning the documents submitted to the House in connection with them; and, without undertaking to pass judgment on matters which are in dispute, I think the conclusion is plain, to which the House should be impelled by honor—I may say by decency—[applause] if it has regard to the uncontradicted, conceded facts in the case.

Let me say at the beginning that in transactions with governments all technical questions of legal liability or of the difference between contracts and moral obligations can always be disregarded. The Government is bound by any contract only so far as it wants to be bound by it. We are not dealing with this matter as a liability arising under a contract between individuals but as representatives of a sovereign in the exercise of sovereignty.

The circumstances under which this transaction took place—all the actions of the Government with respect to it—should guide this body in its decision. Does anybody doubt that the Government was engaged in the task of lowering the price of sugar at that time? Does anybody doubt that the attempt was a meritorious enterprise?

Does anybody doubt that importations of sugar from abroad was the only possible means of breaking down the price except by stark confiscation, which in this country would have been impossible? When the Government took the only means open to it, and when Mr. De Ronde, who never was in the sugar trade, whose ships were already loaded with other freight, in the course of his ordinary transportation business, unloaded at the instance of the Government the goods that were in the holds of his vessels and took on sugar and brought it here on the promise of the Government to find him customers at a rate fixed not by him but by the Government, will anybody doubt that there was an agreement, a contract, as far as one could be made under such conditions? There was an obligation, both moral and legal, from which no decent man would seek to escape, and which no honorable Government would contemplate evading. [Applause.]

That is not all. The cargo started toward this country, and then the price of sugar having fallen here before its arrival, to the relief of all our citizens, Mr. De Ronde and others had ample opportunity to return the cargo and sell it with a profit, or at least without loss, in the Argentine.

Does anybody doubt that they would have elected to utilize that opportunity unless somebody had interfered to prevent those capable business men from pursuing the course which ordinary business prudence imposed on them? And who did interfere to prevent them? It was not an angel from heaven that warned these ships away from the Argentine and bade them come here. It was this Government, through its lawfully appointed officer.

Now, they say that Mr. Rily had no authority to give them this instruction or advice—call it what you will—and that Mr. De Ronde in following it was acting upon his own judgment. It is difficult to treat this contention seriously. Will anybody pretend that if Mr. Rily had not been a Government officer Messrs. De Ronde would have paid the slightest attention to his representations or would have hesitated a moment in seeking safety where safety was to be had; that is to say, by sending the sugar back to the Argentine? Why did they not seek this safety? Why were they not by this obvious measure of precaution saved from the loss which it is admitted they sustained? It was because this Government stepped in and urged upon them the course they pursued. It was at the behest and at the instance of the Government that they brought the sugar here and suffered the loss from which they now seek to be relieved. On this statement of facts, not one of which has been controverted here or is questioned on any side, the course of honor—and that is the only course this Nation can afford to follow or even to consider—is certainly clear. The Government that seeks by quibbling evasions to avoid making good a loss suffered by its citizens in carrying out its policy at its own behest and under its own specific directions, is not a government worthy of American traditions or worthy of the flag that floats over our heads. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the resolution and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that all debate on the resolution and all amendments thereto be now closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the resolution and all amendments thereto is closed. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. That was pro forma.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. I object to withdrawing it. As I understand, there is an amendment pending offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Is that subject to debate?

The CHAIRMAN. No; debate is closed.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. On that amendment as well as all others?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the section and all amendments thereto is closed. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. PARKS of Arkansas) there were—ayes 2, noes 125.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Are there any other amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. There are no other amendments pending.

Mr. PURNELL. Then I move that the committee do now rise and report the joint resolution to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the committee do now rise and report the joint resolution to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration S. J. Res. 79, authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 5,000 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic, had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. By the rule the previous question is ordered. The question is on the third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. KINCHELOE) there were—ayes 102, noes 83.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote because there is no quorum present, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will this be the unfinished business if the House adjourns at this time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would be the unfinished business on Thursday. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absentees. As many as favor the passage of the joint resolution will, as their names are called, vote "yea," those opposed "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 116, nays 115, answered "present" 2, not voting 194, as follows:

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no." I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PAIGE]. I wish to withdraw my vote of "no" and answer "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. PURNELL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the potash situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I rise for the purpose of correcting certain statements and impressions created by an extension of remarks of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE], appearing in the RECORD of December 28, 1922, and a speech made in the House on January 10, 1923, by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER]. In both instances reference is made to potash and the price of that commodity since the passage of the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act.

Many Members have asked me if it is true that potash prices have advanced 345 per cent since the passage of the tariff act. Such is not the case, because potash prices have been practically the same for over a year, and it is not likely there will be any serious changes for several months, because most buyers have contracted for their requirements for the present season.

In the first place it might be well to remember that for many years potash has been on the free list, and, of course, when an effort was made to place a duty of 50 cents a unit or $50 per ton of actual potash, on this commodity, that effort was met with serious opposition.

The effort failed, as you all know, and potash was restored to the free list by a vote of 177 to 130.

The tariff act became effective on September 21, 1922, and, on November 27, 1922, as president of a cooperative buying society, I contracted for 20,000 tons of K20 at a price lower than I recall having ever paid, with one exception. Several years ago during a trade war abroad prices were reduced below the cost of production and for a brief period American buyers were able to profit by that condition. But they soon settled their trouble and prices returned to normal.

It is evident the false impression as to the advance in price was created by information contained in a letter from Mr. Hoover, Secretary of Commerce, to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. GREENE], and included in the remarks of that gentleman.

As some of our farmer friends are alarmed at the prospect of the cost to them of potash carrying the increase specified in the RECORD, I wrote to Mr. Hoover and asked that he state more clearly the actual meaning of the price advance reported in his letter to the gentleman from Vermont.

I have since received from Mr. Hoover the following reply:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 25, 1923.

The Hon. E. C. HUTCHINSON,
House of Representatives.

My DEAR Mr. HUTCHINSON: I am in receipt of your letter of January 19th with regard to potash prices.

I am afraid the discussion has gone all wrong because of the misunderstanding of the term "inland potash prices" which was the term used in publications of this department in reference to the increase in German inland prices.

Prices have been advanced from time to time in Germany in accord with the fall in the mark whereas the export prices in terms of dollars have remained fairly stable for some time.

The men in the department here apparently thought that the term "inland prices" in Germany would be understood as the price in marks and neglected to call attention to the fact that such changes in inland prices did not necessarily represent a change in terms of dollars.

Yours faithfully,

HERBERT HOOVER.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to say to the farmers and people of the country generally that the manufacturers of fertilizers have seldom sold a high-grade fertilizer for as low a price as is being offered this year. This is due largely to the low cost of potash.

There are some materials higher this year, such as ammonia from animal matter, in which the advance figures almost double, but that is a market condition over which the manufacturer and dealer has no control, and even that is largely nullified by the low cost of potash free of tariff duty.

There has been considerable talk of a monopoly in potash, but as Germany and France are the chief producers of potash the prospects of a monopoly are remote. In fact, I predict that the keen desire for business in this country will result in our farmers being assured low cost of potash for some time to come.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 4358. An act to authorize the American Niagara Railroad Corporation to build a bridge across the Niagara River between the State of New York and the Dominion of Canada; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 4387. An act to authorize the building of a bridge across the Tugaloo River, between South Carolina and Georgia; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 4398. An act in recognition of the valor of the officers and men of the Seventy-ninth Division who were killed in action or died of wounds received in action; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 2719. An act to reimburse certain persons for loss of private funds while they were patients at the United States Naval Hospital, Naval Operating Base, Hampton Roads, Va.:

S. 2556. An act for the relief of Edwin Gantner;

S. 2210. An act for the relief of Lucy Paradis;

S. 1945. An act to reimburse the Navajo Timber Co., of Delaware, for a deposit made to cover the purchase of timber;

S. 4309. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii,' approved April 30, 1900, as amended, to establish an Hawaiian Homes Commission, granting certain powers to the board of harbor commissioners of the Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes," approved July 9, 1921;

S. 841. An act for the relief of Elizabeth Marsh Watkins; and

S. 1690. An act to correct the naval record of John Sullivan.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent the following leave of absence was granted:

To Mr. SCOTT of Michigan, indefinitely, on account of illness, at the request of Mr. MAPES.

To Mr. ROSE, at the request of Mr. WALTERS, on account of illness.

To Mr. FUNK, for two days, on account of illness.

To Mr. FULLER, for five days, on account of illness in the family.

To Mr. RAMSEYER, for one week, on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have leave to file a minority report within five days on the Louis Leavitt claim on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that he may have five days to file a minority report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Wyoming yield for me to inquire about the Order of Business?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In regard to the tentative program which the gentleman has kindly given us, will that be carried out on Thursday?

Mr. MONDELL. I think it should be carried out. I made the program on the theory that it was a program that ought to be followed. I shall use my best endeavors to follow it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That includes the conference report on the taxation bill as the first Order of Business.

Mr. MONDELL. Prior to that I think we ought to take up the bill that is now on the Speaker's table on the following day.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman refers to the bank building bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes. However we would leave it with the committee to decide, but that would be my thought in regard to it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The trouble with us innocent bystanders is that after the Committee on Rules has adopted a rule without our suggestion or thought that it will be called up on a certain day the chairman of the Committee on Rules changes the day, not of his own motion, but it keeps us busy answering questions.

Mr. MONDELL. I think we have been following very closely the tentative program that has been announced for a long time at least on Saturday morning, and generally Friday morning of the week before. I think we have not departed from it in any important particular.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Do I understand that the conference report on the bank building bill will probably come up first on Thursday?

Mr. MONDELL. That will depend on the action of the committee. That was to have been taken up this morning. It is a matter to be disposed of as soon as we can. It is a matter of entire indifference to me, but I shall leave it entirely with the committee.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman from Tennessee refers to the bank building bill as a conference report. It is a bill on the Speaker's table which the Senate has passed. It is in lieu of the conference report and will be substituted for the conference report.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. How did it happen that the committee requested a rule for the bill?

Mr. McFADDEN. The request for the rule came before the Senate bill was passed. There has been a cooperation both in the Senate and the House to get the legislation through because of its urgency, and it would seem that it would come a little quicker this way.

Mr. MONDELL. The bank building bill is a House Calendar bill on the Speaker's table.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. How did it happen to come to the Committee on Rules?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know. I had nothing to do with that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I want to have a clear understanding about this. Then that bill can be called up or will be called up on Thursday under whatever parliamentary procedure is necessary.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman from Tennessee desires and it is agreeable to the committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have no disposition or desire about it. All I want to know is about the program of the business. The conference report on the taxation of banks—

Mr. McFADDEN. That is in conference and the conferees meet to-morrow. I expect they will disagree to a portion of it and make a partial report so that we may submit the validation clause, and we hope to have Thursday to consider that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will it be called up ahead of the privileged business of the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. MONDELL. It is a matter of the highest privilege, and my understanding has been that it is the desire of Members of the House, generally, that this matter be disposed of. As to privileged matters of the Committee on Ways and Means we could utilize the balance of the day to dispose of them.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then the conference report will be a partial report, and that will be called up ahead of the business reported by the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. McFADDEN. That is my understanding.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 31, 1923, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

926. A letter from the president of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co., transmitting a report of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. for the year 1922. This report is substituted for the report submitted January 4, 1923; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

927. A letter from the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting copy of a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting report of the withdrawals and restorations of public lands in certain cases; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

928. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a draft of a proposed bill to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to permit the sale of exterior articles of the uniform to honorably discharged enlisted men; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

930. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a communication from the Assistant Secretary of Commerce submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $188.25 to pay claims which have been considered and adjusted by the Director of the Coast and Geodetic Survey under the provisions of the act of June 5, 1920 (41 Stat. 1054), and which require an appropriation for their payment (H. Doc. No. 537); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

931. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of Labor submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $495.69 to pay claims which he has adjusted under the provisions of the act of December 28, 1922 (Public, No. 375, 67th Cong.), and which require an appropriation for their payment (H. Doc. No. 538); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

932. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $3,672.65 to pay claims which he has adjusted under the provisions of the act of December 28, 1922 (Public, No. 375, 67th Cong.), and which require an appropriation for their payment (H. Doc. No. 539); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

933. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting supplemental estimates of appropriations for the Supreme Court of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, for printing and binding, amounting in all to $14,000 (H. Doc. No. 540); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

934. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a draft of legislation regarding service rendered by National Guard officers during temporary Federal recognition prior to December 15, 1922; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McLEAN presented petitions of the Meriden Woman's Club of Meriden, and the League of Women Voters of New Haven County, both in the State of Connecticut, praying an amendment of the Constitution regulating child labor, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Greenwich, Conn., praying for the passage of Senate Joint Resolution 269, authorizing the United States to pay just and meritorious claims for loss of or damage to freight in transportation while the railroads were under Federal control, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BURSUM, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (S. 4305) granting an increase of pension to certain soldiers of the Mexican War and Civil War and their widows and minor children, widows of the War of 1812, Army nurses, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1076) thereon.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3499) for the relief of the Atlas Lumber Co., Babcock & Willcox, Johnson, Jackson & Corning Co., and the C. H. Klein Brick Co., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1077) thereon.

Mr. KENDRICK, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (S. 4146) granting certain lands to Natrona County, Wyo., for a public park, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1079) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts:

A bill (S. 4447) to establish standards for anthracite coal shipped in interstate or foreign commerce; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. KENDRICK:

A bill (S. 4448) for the relief of certain disbursing officers; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. ODDIE:

A bill (S. 4449) granting a pension to Thomas Rea; and

A bill (S. 4450) granting a pension to James S. Kelley; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 4451) to renew and extend certain letters patent; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 4452) for the establishment of a United States industrial home for women at Mount Weather, Va.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. NORBECK:

A bill (S. 4453) to amend sections 3, 4, 9, 12, 15, 21, 22, and 25 of the act of Congress approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm loan act; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 4454) authorizing an appropriation of $25,000 for aid in the construction of a wagon road between Onak and Nespelem on the Colville Indian Reservation in the State of Washington; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

RURAL-CREDIT FACILITIES.

Mr. TRAMMELL submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States, to amend the Federal farm loan act, to amend the Federal reserve act, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. POINDEXTER submitted an amendment proposing that the President be authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint any commissioned officer of the Army not above the grade of colonel who served in the Army during the World War whose service has been creditable, and who has been or may hereafter be retired according to law, to an advanced grade on the retired list at the highest grade held by him during the World War, etc., intended to be proposed by him to House bill 13793, the War Department appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed without amendment the following joint resolutions:

S. J. Res. 12. Joint resolution authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 13,902 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic; and

S. J. Res. 79. Joint resolution authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 5,000 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 8921. An act for the relief of Ellen McNamara; and

H. R. 11397. An act to authorize appropriations for the relief of certain officers of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 472. An act for the relief of William B. Lancaster;

S. 841. An act for the relief of Elizabeth Marsh Watkins;

S. 1690. An act to correct the naval record of John Sullivan;

S. 1945. An act to reimburse the Navajo Timber Co., of Delaware, for a deposit made to cover the purchase of timber;

S. 2210. An act for the relief of Lucy Paradis;

S. 2556. An act for the relief of Edwin Gantner;

S. 2719. An act to reimburse certain persons for loss of private funds while they were patients at the United States Naval Hospital, Naval Operating Base, Hampton Roads, Va.;

S. 4309. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii,' approved April 30, 1900, as amended, to establish an Hawaiian Homes Commission, granting certain powers to the board of harbor commissioners of the Territory of Hawaii, and for other purposes," approved July 9, 1921; and

H. R. 6294. An act promoting civilization and self-support among the Indians of the Mescalero Reservation, in New Mexico.

S. J. Res. 12. Joint resolution authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 13,902 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic; and

S. J. Res. 79. A joint resolution authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 5,000 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were each read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

H. R. 8921. An act for the relief of Ellen McNamara; to the Committee on Naval Affairs; and

H. R. 11397. An act to authorize appropriations for the relief of certain officers of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Claims.

INVESTIGATION OF MEMBERSHIP IN FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 33) providing for the appointment of a joint committee for the purpose of ascertaining the reason why eligible State banks do not join the Federal reserve system. If it leads to any debate, I shall not press its consideration at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I shall not object if it is passed without debate, but if debate should arise then I shall object.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I ask for order. We can not hear what is going on upon the other side.

Mr. McLEAN. I ask that the Secretary report the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the concurrent resolution.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Con. Res. 33) submitted by Mr. McLEAN on the 25th instant, as follows:

Whereas the Federal reserve system was established by the Congress for the benefit of all sections of the country and of all agricultural as well as commercial and industrial interests; and

Whereas it appears from the last annual report of the Federal Reserve Board that 9,640 State banks and trust companies, constituting over 85 per cent of the eligible State banks and trust companies in the United States, have failed to become members of the Federal reserve system:

Resolved, etc., That a joint committee be appointed, to consist of three Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President thereof, and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker thereof. Vacancies occurring in the membership of the committee shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment.

2. That said joint committee is authorized to inquire into the effect of the present limited membership of State banks and trust companies in the Federal reserve system upon financial conditions in the agricultural sections of the United States; the reasons which actuate eligible State banks and trust companies in failing to become members of the Federal reserve system; what administrative measures have been taken and are being taken to increase such membership; and whether or not any change should be made in existing law, or in rules and regulations of the Federal Reserve Board, or in methods of administration, to bring about in the agricultural districts a larger membership of such banks or trust companies in the Federal reserve system.

3. That said committee is authorized to sit at any time during the sessions or recesses of the Congress and conduct its hearings at Washington or at any other place in the United States, to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ experts deemed necessary by such committee, a clerk, and a stenographer to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, such stenographer's services to be rendered at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page, the expenses involved in carrying out this resolution to be paid in equal parts out of the contingent funds of the Senate and House of Representatives.

4. The committee shall from time to time report to both the Senate and the House of Representatives the results of its inquiries, together with its recommendations, and may prepare and submit bills or resolutions embodying such recommendations, and the final report of said committee shall be submitted not later than January 31, 1924.

Mr. McLEAN. I understand that the rate of compensation of stenographers has been changed from $1.25 per printed page to 25 cents per 100 words. I therefore move that the resolution be amended on page 2, in lines 23 and 24, by striking out the words—

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, we can not hear a word that is being said.

Mr. McLEAN. I did not understand that there was any objection to the consideration of the concurrent resolution.

Mr. GLASS. I would like to inquire if there has been unanimous consent given for the consideration of the concurrent resolution at this time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not yet ascertained. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I said a moment ago, if it can be passed without discussion, I shall not object; but if anyone desires to discuss it, then I shall object.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to have an opportunity to look into it and to have it explained.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I object to the consideration of the resolution at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

CUSTOMHOUSE AT MOBILE, ALA.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, out of order, I desire to report favorably and without amendment from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds the bill (H. R. 11731) to provide for the renting of the first floor of the customhouse at Mobile, Ala., to the Mobile Chamber of Commerce. I am sure there will be no discussion of the bill if it shall be considered, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if I may say just one word, I desire to state that there is a space on the first floor of the customhouse building at Mobile, Ala., which is unoccupied. The Chamber of Commerce of Mobile wish to rent and to pay for that space. Should the bill be passed, there will be nothing going out from the Government, but something will be coming in. The bill proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to rent the space referred to on such terms as he may approve, and he has given his indorsement to the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If there is to be no further discussion on the bill, I shall make no objection to its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to rent, under such terms and conditions and for such period as he may prescribe, to the Chamber of Commerce of Mobile, Ala., the first floor of the customhouse, situated at the corner of Royal and St. Francis Streets, in the city of Mobile, Ala., or such parts of the first floor of the above-mentioned Federal building as may be used by the said chamber of commerce.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL NOON TO-MORROW.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LANDS AT CAMP JACKSON, S. C.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, out of order, to have considered Senate bill 4404, which relates merely to the transfer of land back to certain parties in my State. Those lands were donated to Camp Jackson. The bill has been reported unanimously by the Committee on Military Affairs. Now that Camp Jackson has been abandoned, it is proposed that the lands which were donated by certain parties to that camp may be returned to them. I ask unanimous consent for its consideration and passage. I am sure it will create no debate, for there is nothing involved in the bill except merely a return of the lands to the parties who heretofore donated them to Camp Jackson.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. If it will create no further discussion, I shall make no objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMITH. I do not think there will be any further discussion.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4404) authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer to trustees to be named by the Chamber of Commerce of Columbia, S. C., certain lands at Camp Jackson, S. C., which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby authorized to convey by appropriate quitclaim deed to nine trustees and their successors to be selected by the Chamber of Commerce of Columbia,

S. C. and known as "Trustees of Columbia Cantonment Lands," approximately 1,192 acres of land within the United States military reservation at Camp Jackson, S. C., to wit:

The following two tracts of land:

Tract No. 1: Beginning at a stone corner of the Powell, Hampton, and United States Government lands, thence along the Hampton lands north 61 degrees 45 minutes west 3,024 feet to a stone; thence north 47 degrees 5 minutes west 1,956 feet to a stone; thence north 61 degrees 40 minutes west 740 feet to a stone; thence north 27 degrees 20 minutes east across Government lands 2,000 feet to a stone; thence south 87 degrees 40 minutes east 385 feet to a stone; near southeast corner of Camp Jackson incinerator; thence north 6 degrees 20 minutes east 975.5 feet to a stone; thence north 42 degrees 20 minutes east 815 feet to a stone; thence north 82 degrees 20 minutes east 828 feet to a stone; thence north 61 degrees 35 minutes east 1,430 feet to a stone at intersection of old roads; thence south 72 degrees 40 minutes east 1,355 feet to a stone; thence south 85 degrees 40 minutes east 2,798.5 feet to a stone; thence south 27 degrees 50 minutes west 2,654 feet to a stone; corner Powell lands; thence along Powell lands south 79 degrees 35 minutes west 1,290 feet to a stone; thence south 11 degrees 40 minutes west 4,102 feet to a stone, point of beginning, containing in all 705.12 acres.

Tract No. 2: Beginning at a stone on the eastern side of the Camden public road near the 6-mile post; thence along Camden public road south 89 degrees 45 minutes west 800 feet to a stone; thence along the Camden public road south 87 degrees 35 minutes west 985 feet to a stone; thence along the Camden public road south 78 degrees 45 minutes west 184 feet to a stone; thence south 12 degrees 50 minutes east 985 feet to a stone; thence north 85 degrees 45 minutes east 1,240 feet to a stone; thence south 63 degrees 5 minutes east 1,984 feet to a stone 6 feet from paved road; thence in an easterly and northerly direction 922 feet along paved road to a stone 6 feet from paving; thence south 82 degrees 20 minutes east 1,050 feet to a stone; thence north 73 degrees 50 minutes east 1,325 feet to a stone; thence north 8 degrees 20 minutes east 270 feet to a stone; thence south 86 degrees east 408 feet to a stone; thence south 7 degrees 30 minutes west 217 feet to a stone; thence south 64 degrees 25 minutes west 570 feet to a stone; thence south 53 degrees 25 minutes west 1,460 feet to a stone; thence south 50 degrees 25 minutes east 323 feet to a stone; thence north 71 degrees 55 minutes east 1,300 feet to a stone; thence north 32 degrees 15 minutes east 2,131 feet to a stone on the north side of the Ancrum Ferry Road; thence north 3 degrees 40 minutes east 4,315 feet to a stone on the eastern side of the Camden public road; thence along said Camden public road south 38 degrees 30 minutes west 211 feet to a stone; thence south 36 degrees 55 minutes west 1,039 feet to a stone; thence south 55 degrees 50 minutes west 620 feet to a stone near the 7-mile post; thence south 87 degrees 55 minutes west 779 feet to a stone; thence south 69 degrees 40 minutes west 498 feet to a stone; thence south 55 degrees 55 minutes west 1,330 feet to a stone on the southerly side of the Ancrum Ferry Road; thence south 75 degrees 20 minutes west 811 feet to a stone near branch; thence south 70 degrees 15 minutes west 1,265 feet to a stone; thence south 68 degrees 25 minutes west 890 feet to a stone near branch; thence north 89 degrees 20 minutes west 166 feet to a stone, the point of beginning, containing in all 486.88 acres; the lands so conveyed being approximately equal in area to the lands donated to the United States by the said chamber of commerce as a part of the site on the said reservation by deeds executed by J. Irwin Belser, trustee, dated July 20, 1917, and November 16, 1917: Provided, That prior to such conveyance by the Secretary of War there shall be conveyed to the United States by appropriate deed all the rights of way and other rights reserved in the aforementioned deeds of donation to the United States to the extent that the Secretary of War may require.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby further authorized, in his discretion, to grant by revocable license to the said trustees, their successors or assigns, subject to such conditions and restrictions as he may deem necessary to protect the interests of the United States and to such regulations as he may from time to time prescribe, the right to use, in common with the United States, the existing roadways and railway lines of the United States, steam or electric, now located upon and extending over and across the reservation, and also the right to occupy and use such other lands within the said reservation as he may designate for the construction and operation thereon of steam or electric railway lines to extend to the lands to be conveyed to the said trustees as hereinabove described, the United States to have the right to use without charge any railway lines or tracks so constructed on the reservation: Provided, That the said existing roadways and railway lines on the reservation so occupied and used and the railway lines so constructed and operated thereon shall be maintained and kept in a good state of repair, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, at the sole expense of the said trustees, their successors or assigns.

SEC. 3. That the said trustees shall hold, use, manage, lease, sell, and convey, or otherwise dispose of said lands, or any portion thereof, and of the proceeds and revenues of the same, for one or more of the following purposes as they may deem best, to wit: Agricultural, industrial, charitable, and educational purposes: Provided, however, That no sale or conveyance shall be made by the said trustees of the lands conveyed by the Secretary of War under this act until the Secretary of War shall have given his consent in each instance to such sale or conveyance.

SEC. 4. That a majority of the said trustees shall constitute a quorum competent to transact business, and that the said trustees shall make such by-laws, rules, and regulations for their own government and for the management and control of the said property and the proceeds thereof as they may deem necessary and proper, and that in the event of any vacancy occurring among the said trustees by death, resignation, removal of residence from Richland County, S. C., or other cause, such vacancy shall be filled from residents of Richland County by selection by a majority of the remaining trustees, such selection to be approved by the chamber of commerce of the city of Columbia, S. C., or its successors; and if there be no successors, then such selection shall be approved by a majority vote of a committee composed of the president of the University of South Carolina, the mayor of the city of Columbia, the senator in the General Assembly of South Carolina from Richland County, the probate judge of Richland County, and the resident judge of the judicial circuit of South Carolina embracing Richland County, or their respective successors.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STANDARD OF BUTTER.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3858) to define butter and to provide a standard therefor. It is a short bill, and I think if it be considered there will be no discussion of it.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, of course, I do not desire to object to the consideration of the bill, but Senators now see the situation which has arisen by reason of our frittering away Calendar Monday. I was entirely to blame, for I should have objected on Monday morning to everything proposed, so that we might have reached the calendar. The Senate needs a Calendar Monday or at least a calendar day once a week. When Senators fritter away that morning, then necessity drives us and drives them to interfere with the routine business. I shall not object to the consideration of the bill which is asked for by the Senator from South Dakota, but I hope that hereafter we may at least have Calendar Monday, for there are bills on the calendar to which, in my judgment, there is no objection. But when the calendar is not considered on Monday, as the rule provides, we are required to rise, as Senators are now rising, and to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of bills. In this instance I shall not object, but I hope this may be a lesson to us and that we shall not hereafter fritter away Calendar Monday.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded.

RURAL-CREDIT FACILITIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States; to amend the Federal farm loan act; to amend the Federal reserve act; and for other purposes.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I desire to discuss the pending bill and matters in general in reference to farm legislation and the farmers' program.

I think some confusion has arisen in the situation here, and I am going to see what I can do to straighten it out from the farmer's standpoint. I have had some communication with the farmers, and I know something about their idea of the legislation proposed at this session of Congress. I think the first idea of all the farmers everywhere all over the United States is that the ship subsidy bill should be defeated. I think that is the first thing they are considering everywhere.

We have heard discussion about the farm bloc being responsible for the delay in the enactment of farm legislation, and all of that; but I will tell Senators that I do not think there ought to be anybody in the farm bloc who believes in the ship subsidy bill, and when matters settle down a little I think we shall have to prefer charges against some of them and have a heresy trial and clear the farm bloc up a little.

The farmers wanted to increase the loan limit of the Federal land banks. That was one little act of legislation for which they stood and the Senate has provided for that by the passage of the Capper bill.

They wanted to extend the time of rediscounting paper by the Federal reserve banks so that it would fit the farming business. The biggest business in this country is farming. The farmers are contributing the greatest percentage to the bank deposits of the country, and yet the business of farming is not recognized in the great Federal reserve bank system. The bill which is now before us merely proposes to raise the limit of agricultural loans to nine months when the farmers need three years. The idea has grown in the minds of many men that the money of the farmers deposited in banks is taken, put in a reserve, mobilized, moved around over the country as it pleases certain interests, used to back up loans of other business in the country, but the farmer is denied a line of credit that will fit his own business; in other words, he is denied the use of his own money in his own business. The authorization of nine months' paper instead of six months would be some little advantage to the farmers, but not much. So the pending bill is wholly inadequate in that respect.

The only bill which has been presented here that will give the farmers immediate relief in any way is the Norris bill, consideration of which has been refused because my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and other Senators claim it is socialism or communism or some other kind of ism.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator is making a mistake. I said it was a pawnbroking proposal. I never accused it of having the dignity of socialism or communism.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator from Mississippi corrects me and says it is a "pawnbroking" measure. In reply I can only say that we had better enact that kind of a pawnbroking measure than some of the other measures which have been enacted by Congress.

Another measure which the farmers would like to see enacted is the Voigt filled milk bill. I understand from the newspapers that as a result of a conference held the other night that bill is to be sidetracked so that we may get back to the shipping bill.

Another measure the farmers would like to have enacted is the truth in fabric bill, but I understand the switch has been opened for that measure, so that it, too, will go on the sidetrack and will not receive consideration at this session of Congress.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. To what conference does the Senator refer as having agreed to sidetrack these meritorious measures?

Mr. BROOKHART. The Baltimore Sun contained an account to the effect that a number of distinguished Senators slipped around to the White House after the newspaper men had all gone away to arrange these matters.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Sun tell who composed the party of Senators referred to?

Mr. BROOKHART. I think probably it does, but I think the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] or the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] could give the Senator more accurate information than does the Baltimore Sun.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator think those two Senators inspired the meeting?

Mr. BROOKHART. No; I do not say that; I do not recall that the article so stated, and I do not think they knew who inspired the meeting.

Mr. CARAWAY. The opinion of the Senator from Iowa is that the advocates of ship subsidy inspired the meeting?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; that is my opinion; that the ship subsidy bill was getting on dangerous rocks and something had to be done. The United States Chamber of Commerce seems to be of the same opinion, because it is filling all the papers with editorials and articles to the effect that a vote must be had on the shipping bill in some way or other immediately.

In this situation, in addition to the legislative proposals referred to, the farmers and their organizations are all the time teaching the doctrine of cooperation. They believe it ought to be taught to everybody. That is why they are for the bill of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], instead of the pending bill, because it is really a cooperative bill.

For that reason I wish to say to the Senate that I have rather welcomed the night-school suggestion which has been made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. I think we ought to start a night school of cooperation. I have had quite a good deal to do with night schools in my time. I have been a teacher all my life, and have had a great many night schools with the farmers and a good many with the laboring people and quite a good many with the soldiers, so that I rather welcome the proposal to have a night school in the Senate. I talked to the farm bloc members about that, and told them I had some subjects to present to the school and I thought we could organize the Senate into a school on cooperation. I am sure there is nothing could happen in the United States that the farmers would approve more than that; in fact, I was talking to some farmers this morning and they were blaming the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Washington for not starting the proposed night school three or four weeks ago. So far as I am concerned, I can tell the Senate something about what I would suggest in reference to that school. I have a little volume here on the subject of cooperation the world over with special relation to the subject of cooperation in credits.

I have agreed that at these night schools I will take up some of these propositions with the Senate myself. I told them I thought I would need about two weeks of nights to present all of this to the Senate, but they objected to that. They thought seven or eight nights were enough for me. I am only going to present the kindergarten phases of this proposition myself, but I think they need to be studied most carefully. After I get through with that we are going then to turn the big guns loose and give them a high-school course and a university course; so I really believe that this night school may become the greatest cooperative school that has ever been conducted in the world.

I got a letter from the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURRIS] about this matter. They say that Republican Senators are advised that there will be evening sessions beginning to-morrow, Wednesday, January 31, and each night thereafter until the Lenroot rural credits bill is passed. Of course, you notice that the sessions will continue until it is passed, so we can run this school quite a while if we can get an attendance. It says their attendance is urgently needed, to the end that a quorum may be available both day and evening.

In reference to the attendance, I think that all the Republican Senators who are in favor of the ship subsidy bill surely ought to attend this school. I think they ought to be here all the time. So far as the other Senators are concerned—a large number of Republicans and the Democrats who are opposed—it does not matter so much about them. They probably do not need the instruction so badly, anyhow; and if the very distinguished Senator from Massachusetts can attend the school all the time—and I understand that a school like this can not succeed unless there is a quorum present; they need to be there all the time—if he can attend it all the time we can probably make him, in view of his distinguished record in letters, the historian of this school; and I think it will really make a chapter in the history of the American Republic that will meet the approval of every farmer and every laboring man and every soldier and every mother of our land.

Now I desire to point out something of the big issue in this discussion. We have a bill before us. There is something very remarkable about that bill. You notice it goes down into the Treasury of the United States, first, for $60,000,000 and then for $120,000,000, under certain conditions. That money is to be used to issue certain debentures to certain banks and things. No loans are proposed to be made to any farmer. Of course, I can remember a very short time ago when the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] would be denouncing a bill like that as socialistic and as communistic and all that sort of thing, so I would at first thought be inclined to congratulate the Senator from Wisconsin on the fact that he has turned these erstwhile ultraconservatives into such a radical channel; but on second thought, you know, there is a little more than that. As soon as we get out of the way this $120,000,000 or $60,000,000, or whatever it is, which is to take care of 7,000,000 farmers and their families, to take care of the business growing out of an $80,000,000,000 investment, or thereabouts, with an annual turnover of from ten to fifteen billion dollars—as soon as this little sixty or one hundred and twenty million dollars, with certain debentures subject to the approval of the banks, can be raised there is something bigger in sight, and, of course, that is not socialistic. It is not communistic. It never was, in the language of the conservatives. The other proposition is that we will give to a few fellows, just a small number of them, in a shipping trust, $750,000,000 out of the National Treasury.

The little sixty or one hundred and twenty millions that is provided here to start with is all to be paid back by the farmers of the United States. They are promising to pay it back. Every Senator, everybody, knows that they will pay it back. So the Government is not taking much chance in that little socialistic venture; but the $750,000,000 which is to be turned over to the Shipping Trust under this bill never will be paid back. It will always stand.

You can see in that one of the reasons why the farmers of the United States are saying, "First, defeat the shipping bill." That is of most importance in this session to the farmers, because the relief that is offered to them is inadequate. It does not amount to much in comparison to the tax in this other line that will be put on them forever, because the farmers are ultimate consumers that pay taxes.

The Senator from Wisconsin made the point that we were delaying immediate relief to the farmers; but it was the Senator from Wisconsin, among others, who opposed and defeated the consideration of the Norris bill, the only bill that has been proposed here that would give immediate relief to the farming interests of the United States. Not only that, but the Senator delayed this little, inadequate bill; it was not reported in here until the farmers had disposed of most of their grain and crops. Most of that crop is now in the hands of the speculator, so that the title of his bill ought to be changed, perhaps, to a bill for the relief of the speculators. I think it would do them at this late day—or the date even at which it was reported—far more good than it would the farmers.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Is the Senator in favor of the Norris bill? Would he like to see it enacted now?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator, then, think that the farmer would get the benefit, if he has sold his crops, and they are all in the hands of speculators? Whom would the Senator benefit by the Norris bill?

Mr. BROOKHART. If we enact it now, we would lose a good deal of the benefit we would have had if it had been enacted earlier.

Mr. LENROOT. And who would be benefited by it—the speculator or the farmer?

Mr. BROOKHART. If we had come here and opened up this Congress with the consideration of that bill, instead of having a special session to consider ship subsidy for the shipping trust, that bill would have gone through in time to do the farmers some good.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but the Senator said he was in favor of the enactment of the Norris bill now.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. He also said the farmers' product was in the hands of the speculator. Therefore, it necessarily follows that the Senator from Iowa is in favor of a bill taking immense moneys out of the Treasury of the United States for the benefit of the speculators of the United States.

Mr. BROOKHART. I did not say I would use those funds to benefit any speculators, either, and I know how to fix those funds so that they will help the farmers next year and not help the speculators; and that is what I favor now, if the Senator wants to know. The speculator has no calling cards on my desk.

I want to get in some way a credit system that will give the farmers some voice in its control. I want to get a credit system that will back agriculture. I say to you that the greatest development of this age is the cooperative movement. It is the greatest in every line of business all over the world. It is the greatest development of the last two or three years in the United States.

It has more sound business principles and sound business reasons behind it than any other system of business that has ever been inaugurated in this world. Every position I take and every movement I make is with the idea of developing the great cooperative idea. That is why I have offered this amendment to this bill to provide for permission now—just permission—to organize cooperative banks. The amendment which I have offered does not interfere with the present banking system, does not interfere with any established business, but it does give the farmer permission, if he wants to, to organize a cooperative bank.

Why should he want that? I have talked to members of the Federal Reserve Board; I have talked to Eugene Meyer, of the War Finance Corporation; and I have talked to other big financiers in New York, and I have asked them to determine what proportion of bank deposits the farmers of this country furnish to the banks. I never have been able to get an authoritative answer or estimate from any source. I took an estimate out in my own State, and there the bankers' associations admit that the farmers in that State make more than 75 per cent of all the deposits in all the banks of the State. My own belief is that it is nearly 85 per cent. That being true, I took that as a basis, took the proportion of agricultural business in Iowa to other business, and took a percentage from that relation. Then I took the total farming business of the United States and multiplied it by that percentage, and upon that estimate it gives something like 40 per cent that the farmers deposit in all the banks of all the United States. That may be too high, but nobody has ever estimated it lower than 25 per cent to me.

The Senator from Wisconsin in his presentation of this bill discussed that proposition. He said:

In that connection I wish to say just a word with reference to what has been so often repeated upon the floor in debate upon the so-called Capper bill and in the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which I am not a member. It has been repeatedly stated that the farmers of the country have furnished 40 per cent of the deposits of the member banks of the Federal reserve system and that the implication therefore follows, or it is tried to have it follow, that because of that fact the farmers were entitled to 40 per cent of the total available credit. Mr. President, a farmer who deposits money in a bank is just as anxious for the protection of that deposit as is a merchant or anyone else. The farmer who deposits money in a bank is just as interested as any other depositor in having loans of that bank either liquid or of such character that should he want his deposit back he is going to be sure to get it. So, when an attempt is made to create a distinction between the farmers' deposits and other deposits, it is simply absurd. The interest of both classes of depositors is exactly the same in that connection.

I think that comment of the Senator from Wisconsin raises the basic issue about the control of these deposits. The Senator's conclusion is based upon the theory that when a farmer puts deposits in a bank he has not sense enough to know how he wants those deposits to be used; that he must submit to some superior knowledge or some superior business idea outside of this greatest of all our businesses, and must have his deposits and the credit built upon them controlled by some one else.

The Senator says he wants the farmer's deposits safe, but he is not willing to concede that he should have any voice or any power in the control of those deposits to make them safe. It is the theory that is coming down from the top everywhere. Everyone of the big bankers whispers to you, "Go ahead with your cooperative movement, but do not touch the banks. Do not touch them; they are the friends of cooperation. Keep away from the banks."

I want to combat that theory completely. I want to say that every cooperative movement in the world that is succeeding has control of its own cooperative credit. There is not an exception where there has been success, and this theory that the farmers, furnishing this vast amount of deposits, shall have no voice in their use is wrong.

What is the purpose of a bank anyway? A bank is the agent of the depositors. A bank is employed by the depositors and the borrower. It is the middleman. It is not the dominant agency; it is the servient agency in all of these relations, and the depositors have the right to control and to say how the bank will use those funds. They exercise that right sometimes by withdrawing their deposits when the bank is not managed to suit them.

The farmers have just wakened up to this great fact, which has been concealed from them all these years. They have just found out that their total deposits amount to this vast sum, and they have said, "We have reached the time when we want to organize those deposits under our own control."

If it be true that the farmers deposit even 25 per cent in the banks of the country, then they deposited more than $4,000,000,000 in the national banks in 1920. John Skelton Williams in his report as comptroller shows that agriculture received back for use in its own business only $1,998,000,000, and that occurred at the time of the great contraction of credit.

We find that under the banking system at that time the Beef Trust, Armour & Co., went out in the spring of 1920 and floated $60,000,000 of 10-year loans at 8 per cent. I have talked to Members of Congress since I came to the Senate who bought some of that paper. Swift & Co. got $50,000,000 in that way, and the other day in investigating the Sinclair Oil Co. we found that at the same time it got $46,000,000. My understanding is that all of the great concerns came in and made provision for their financing and their credit ahead of the deflation which occurred in the fall of 1920.

They were directors in these banks; they were in close touch with the Federal Reserve Board and the governing boards of the branch banks. They knew what was going to happen, and they provided accordingly, and the banks assisted them. They sent out the inspiration, the "dope," that this paper was good, and the farmers' own money was used to finance those institutions, when, in fact, it should have been conserved for use in agriculture. Then followed the deflation and the losses which we have discussed so much.

I say in the first place that the farmer not only has a right to have his representation on that board but he has a right to have a proportion of membership on that board equal to his proportion of deposits. That would mean three members of the board instead of one member.

For the same reason labor, which deposits more than 25 per cent in the banks of the country, would be entitled to two members of that board, and I say that if that board were controlled by people looking out first for the interests of the farmers and the laboring people, the great producers of this country, this speculative control would end and this speculative system would cease.

That is not sufficient. That would help, but the farmers come at this time and say: "We would like permission to organize a cooperative bank in our own way. You can put all the restrictions for safety and inspection around it you want—we have no objection to anything of that kind—but we want a system that will give us control of our own deposits." Then the Senator from Wisconsin says that if the farmers start out for a thing like that it is going to defeat this whole bill. I would like to inquire of the Senator who has said the bill would be defeated if we adopted this amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. If we were going to enter into that subject, it is one on which the Senate, under any kind of normal consideration, would desire to spend a great deal of time. In view of the fact that this bill must go to the House and be considered there, it would, in the opinion of the Senator from Wisconsin, have the effect of defeating the bill.

Mr. BROOKHART. Does the Senator think anybody in the House will dispute the farmer's natural right to organize his own bank, in which to deposit his own funds on a cooperative plan?

Mr. LENROOT. No; but I would expect that Members of the House and Members of the Senate would hardly be willing to take only the judgment of the Senator from Iowa upon a very comprehensive matter of that kind, without each Senator and each Representative having an opportunity to give it serious consideration.

Mr. BROOKHART. Does the Senator insist that the farmers are not for this proposition?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not know whether they are or not. I never heard of it until this morning, in the form presented by the Senator from Iowa. No farmers' organization has presented it to any committee of Congress; no farmers' organization has ever made its demand upon anybody in either House of Congress, so far as I know, in regard to it. It may be that the Senator from Iowa solely represents the farmers of the United States. It may be that he has superior knowledge of what they desire. But I will assume, until I know the contrary, that the farmers, through their authorized representatives appearing here before the various committees, are presenting the real demands of the farmers.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator from Wisconsin stated in the first part of his statement that he did not know whether the farmers were for it or not, and I feel quite sure that is accurate. President Barrett, of the National Board of Farm Organizations, called me this morning and suggested that he wanted to support this amendment as strongly as possible. The National Farmers' Union adopted resolutions in its national convention for cooperative banking. The ex-president of the American Farm Bureau Federation recently spoke in New York in favor of cooperative banking for the farmer.

Mr. LENROOT. Does that mean they indorse the Senator's bill? Because a farmers' organization indorses rural-credit legislation, does that mean they indorse every bill that is introduced upon that subject?

Mr. BROOKHART. There is only one cooperative banking proposition. Whenever a cooperative banking bill is introduced, it may differ somewhat in minor details from others, but in the fundamental proposition they will all be the same if they are cooperative; so they have indorsed it to that extent.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator contends that all wisdom with reference to the subject is centered in the Senator from Iowa and the bill he has introduced.

Mr. BROOKHART. The cooperative idea is centered in it, and that is the reason why I think we should have a cooperative school here in the Senate. I think these Senators who go around and talk to bankers who are opposed to cooperation fail to get the cooperative angle on things, and I think the time has come when we will have to do something so they will understand what cooperation really means.

I do not know much about it, but I am very firm in what little I do know. I can not be sidetracked easily from that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. KING. I was compelled to be absent from the session this morning on official business and I have not had the pleasure of hearing the Senator's address. For information, has the Senator introduced a bill embodying his views and the cooperative plan to which he has just referred?

Mr. BROOKHART. I have offered an addition to the Lenroot bill simply giving permission to farmers to organize these cooperative banks. I think, in order that we may get an understanding of its provisions, I will read it. It is not very long.

Mr. KING. Of course, the Senator will understand I do not want to divert him from the line of his argument, and I hope he will not permit me to do so.

Mr. BROOKHART. I am glad to be interrupted; I always am; and am glad to answer the Senator's questions if possible. Mr. President, may we have the amendment read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. LENROOT. I suggest that the Senator offer his amendment and have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator offer his amendment?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 18, after line 22, the Senator from Iowa proposes to add the following:

SEC. 12. That section 5133 of the Revised Statutes relating to the formation of national banking associations be amended by adding thereto the following: "Provided, That associations for carrying on the business of banking under this title may be formed by any number of natural persons, not less in any case than 200, with a capital stock subscription of not less than $15,000 to be known as cooperative national banks."

SEC. 13. That section 5134 of the Revised Statutes be amended by adding thereto the following:

"Persons uniting to form a cooperative national bank shall under their hands make an organization certificate which shall specifically state:

"First, each and all of the five statements required for other banking associations under the section.

"Second, That each share shall be $10 par value and each shareholder shall have one vote and no more, and the capital stock shall not vote, and proxies shall not be allowed.

"Third, That the capital stock shall receive dividends not exceeding the legal interest rate in the State where the bank is located, and in no event exceeding 8 per cent per annum, and subject to the provision that the net earnings of the bank are first sufficient to pay such dividends.

"Fourth, That one-fourth of all other net earnings shall be passed to surplus until the surplus is equal to the capital stock. That the other three-fourths and thereafter all other net earnings shall be distributed to the depositors and to the borrowers from the bank who are stockholders in proportion to the amount of interest received by the depositors and the amount of interest paid by the borrowers.

"Fifth, Upon liquidation, after payment of liabilities, the capital stock shall be redeemed at par with dividends as before provided and all other assets of the bank shall be distributed to the depositors and borrowers then stockholders of the bank in the same proportions provided for the distribution of dividends."

SEC. 14. That the amount which a cooperative national bank may loan to one person or corporation shall not exceed 5 per cent of its deposits, and loans for productive purposes shall have preference, and no loans shall be made for purely speculative purposes.

SEC. 15. That all provisions of the Federal reserve act and of the national banking act not inconsistent herewith shall be applicable to the cooperative national banks; and it is further provided that after 1,000 cooperative national banks have been organized they may establish a cooperative reserve of their own and become members thereof by subscribing for capital stock therein equal to 5 per cent of their own capital stock. Such cooperative reserve bank may also admit as members cooperative State banks organized substantially upon the same plan as cooperative national banks, and the plan of such cooperative reserve bank shall be substantially the same as cooperative national banks, except that its stockholders and members shall be only cooperative banks as herein provided.

SEC. 16. That a tax of one-tenth of 1 per cent per annum shall be levied upon the total deposits of each cooperative national bank and paid into the Treasury of the United States, to be known as the deposit guaranty fund, and the same shall be used by the Treasurer of the United States to immediately pay depositors in the cooperative national banks the full amount of their deposits upon the liquidation of any such bank. That such tax shall cease when its accumulations amount to 3 per cent of the total deposits of all cooperative national banks and shall be automatically relieved to maintain said 3 per cent. That after a cooperative reserve is organized, as herein provided, the said tax for guarantee of depositors shall be paid to said cooperative reserve bank instead of the Treasurer of the United States, and shall be disposed of by it as herein provided.

SEC. 17. That cooperative national banks shall use the words "cooperative" and "national" in their title, and no other banks shall use the word "cooperative" except State banks which are organized upon substantially the principles as herein provided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. BROOKHART. Now, Mr. President, I desire to review the situation of cooperative banking throughout the world where cooperative enterprises have met with such great success. As I have said, in many countries cooperative business of every kind is becoming the leading business. In Great Britain now one-third of all the business is through the Rochdale Cooperative Association and its branches. Its banking turnover in 1919 was $2,500,000,000, being next to the Bank of England in importance. It had an increase of 26 per cent in the first six months of 1920, and the increase, while perhaps not at that great rate, continues. The association now has 108 factories, many of them the greatest in the world, all operated cooperatively. It owns its own steamships. It needs no ship subsidy. It is the biggest purchaser of Canadian wheat. It has started upon the big estates of England and now has 40,000 acres, worth perhaps £3,000,000, all operated cooperatively. It writes one-half of the life insurance and accident insurance in all Great Britain. This great cooperative association, through its branches, has brought about a turnover of more than $1,000,000,000 a year. Mr. Thorpe, perhaps the merchant prince of the world, is its manager. There is no one equal to him in the business world in these times, unless it would be Henry Ford. He manages that business on a salary of £850. He is a cooperator and would not change his place with any business man in the world. He has a higher place than any mere money-making business proposition, where profits are taken from the people without their consent.

This great system is growing so fast and so soundly that in perhaps less than 20 years there will be nothing but cooperative business in Great Britain. It has succeeded—why? Because it has established a banking department of its own under its own control. It has never borrowed money from outside banks. It has money to lend them. Its money is comprised of the deposits of workers who started the institution, because that great cooperative institution was started by 28 flannel weavers away back in 1843. It took them a year and a half to save their pennies to raise a pound apiece, and with that $140 they started the little store in December, 1844. It has grown to its present great proportions because it early established its own credit system which would back its own enterprises. I think there is no capitalist or anybody else who would deny the right of these men to mobilize their own funds under their own control in their own banks. Having done that, it has reached these vast proportions.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. KING. My recollection of the organization to which the Senator refers is that it is a series of corporations organized under what might be denominated private statutes in contradistinction to a general charter granted organizations by Parliament. If I am in error, I should be glad to be corrected.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the Senator is substantially correct in the statement. It is an organization under what they call the cooperative corporation act. They all embody the same principles that are included in my amendment to the Lenroot bill now under consideration.

Mr. KING. May I invite the Senator's attention, if he will pardon me, to the fact that in legislating in Congress we should bear in mind the fact that we are somewhat different from Great Britain. I do not mean to say I am antagonizing the Senator's proposition at all. It has very much to commend itself. It has just been brought to my attention.

As I was about to observe, in legislating here we should bear in mind the fact that we have a dual form of government; that, generally speaking, the States look after domestic corporations under their police and under their sovereign powers, and the corporations which are organized under the laws of a State may not confine their activities solely to the State. They are interstate rather than intrastate. It is very seldom now that we have a purely intrastate corporation. The activities of our railroad corporations and even our State banking corporations and our State insurance corporations extend beyond the boundaries of the States in which they have been incorporated.

The point I want to make is this: May not the Senator's plan be executed by the various cooperative organizations organizing under State laws and then consolidating and mobilizing, as they would have the right to do, as I recall the statutes of most of the States, for the purpose of establishing the large reservoir of reserve which the Senator's proposition involves? I hope the Senator will not think I want him to digress from the continuity of his remarks, but if he can discuss that feature later on I shall be very glad.

Mr. BROOKHART. I shall be very glad to discuss it at this time. This is as good a time as any to consider the proposition, and I am glad the Senator asked the question.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has informed me that about one-third of the banks in the United States are national banks. The other two-thirds would be State banks. I thought it was a little nearer half-and-half, but possibly not. Therefore our banking business is divided into two parts, National and State. The banks are working along side by side without interference one with another. Therefore the best way to promote the cooperative idea would be to start with a national law. My proposition is only an amendment of the national bank act itself, permitting the organization, under the regulations and restrictions of the national bank act, of cooperative national banks also. It would not disturb the State banks, nor would it disturb the national banks, except that in the farming and laboring communities I think very many of them would reorganize and consolidate under the provisions of my amendment, if they had permission to do so. But we can not now organize a cooperative national bank and get a charter or certificate for that purpose.

A cooperative State bank can not be organized except in a few States. I believe some of the States have laws under which mutual banking companies may be organized. Therefore the great help the amendment will afford will be in giving a general permission to the farmers and the laboring people of the country to develop their cooperative ideas. It does not propose to take a dollar out of the United States Treasury; it does not call on the Federal Government for help in any way. It leaves it to those people to do it all themselves as individuals, and in that way to organize a cooperative system. The trouble is that nobody thought about this in the beginning, or, if they did think about it, they carefully avoided putting anything in our national laws that would permit the organization of cooperative societies of any kind. There is nothing we need more in the United States now, nothing more urgent that the Congress should do, than to enact a whole cooperative code, something such as that under which the Rochdale system is organized in England; at least a code that would permit such things to be done.

Now, I wish to call attention to the cooperative credit systems of some of the other countries of the world.

The Commonwealth Bank of Australia, which, with one small exception, is the only known bank in the world without a cent of stock outstanding, reports for the six months ending January 1, 1922, net profits of $1,501,988 par.

Before I proceed further along that line, however, let me say to the Senator from Utah that the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers have organized what they call a cooperative national bank; in fact, they organized a national bank the same as any other national bank, with the stock held the same way as that of any other national bank. Then their stockholders signed an agreement to operate the bank under cooperative by-laws. Senators will see the disadvantage under which the locomotive engineers labored in organizing a bank of that kind. They can not secure a cooperative charter, but they have to go to all of the trouble to secure an agreement on the part of all of their members everywhere, and then they do not know how legal it is going to be when some stockholder may come in and claim the dividends.

So my amendment is designed to give them permission to do the things which they are already trying to do under the present law, which is not broad enough.

I know the grand chief of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. He was a farm boy a few years ago in my home county. I have known him always. He is a big man in every way—one of the biggest men in our country, for that matter. That locomotive engineers' bank has grown until its resources are now some $19,000,000. It has caused the consolidation of 21 other banks into three banks, and the demand for the cooperative idea has developed there in the most remarkable degree. Then recently they have gone into New York and have acquired control of another large bank, which will be changed by these same cooperative agreements and be operated cooperatively. Some of the big financiers of New York—I talked to some of them—are convinced that the cooperative plan is the safest and the best for banking generally, although most of them, of course, take the other view.

Now, in further reference to the Australian bank—

The Commonwealth Bank was established on January 20, 1913, by the Government of Australia and is owned and controlled by the people of the Commonwealth. Its purpose is to protect the people from usury and exploitation by the big bankers. It started without capital on a loan advanced by the Government, and has not only completely repaid the loan from its profits but has, in addition, piled up a large surplus. The bank has branches in the larger cities of the country, and has succeeded in keeping interest rates down to the minimum while lending money for productive purposes and agricultural development. Its deposits now exceed $374,000,000.

That bank is encouraging every cooperative organization. It is really a Government operated bank all the way through.

In reference to Bulgaria—

Nearly half of the cooperative societies in Bulgaria are people's banks or cooperative credit unions modeled on the Raiffeisen and Schulze-Delitsch credit societies of Europe. The 993 peasant banks have liberated the Bulgarian people from the scourge of usury, and are financing and developing other forms of cooperation. The Central Cooperative Bank of Sofia has a capital of $2,446,000 par, representing a 100 per cent increase over 1919. The annual turnover of the bank is nearly $300,000,000 par, of which $15,500,000 represents money loaned to cooperative societies.

In Canada—

Early in the present year the Province of Ontario adopted a cooperative code and created a democratic banking system which places it in the lead of cooperative progress on this continent. The Ontario law specifically defines what constitutes honest cooperation, and makes utterly impossible the existence of fake cooperators.

Such a feature in a cooperative law is very necessary, and in the amendment I have limited the use of the word "cooperative" in the United States as applied to banks.

All organizations calling themselves cooperative must be conducted on the sound principle of one member one vote, regardless of the amount of stock held. Proxy voting is not permitted. Surplus savings arising from the business must be distributed cooperatively, provided 2 per cent of the annual surplus may be placed in a reserve fund and 5 per cent may be expended for educational or social purposes.

In addition to this Magna Charta of honest cooperation, the Ontario Government has just taken steps to solve the farm-credit problem on the cooperative basis. Branch treasury offices are being opened in the leading towns, where the people can deposit their savings, the resulting funds to be used for agricultural development and other public improvements. Four of these treasury offices are already opened and 12 others are being organized. It is a principle of the government not only to promote thrift by this means but to cut the interest rate below that charged by the private banks.

As to Czechoslovakia—

Of the 12,336 cooperative societies in Czechoslovakia 5,186, or nearly one-half, are cooperative banks and credit societies. Since agriculture is the main industry of the country, two-thirds of these people's banks serve the farmers. They do more than a mere banking business for the farmer. They supply him with capital to buy a farm, erect buildings, purchase implements, stock, seed, fodder, and coal, and to market or manufacture his produce.

Contrast a system like that with the restricted system we have in the United States, where I know not of a single bank anywhere organized under the old plan that even pretends to accommodate the farming business as it ought to be accommodated, and that regardless of the value of the security behind the loan. The time limit and all other conditions look in the commercial direction. They turn their backs upon the farmer all the time.

They promote and finance all other forms of cooperation, including cooperative stores, home-building societies, linen factories, and creameries. These agricultural banks are called Kampelicky, after the name of the founder. They are modeled on the Raiffeisen plan, so successful in Germany. There are both local and district banks, the former with 400,000 members and deposits exceeding 1,000,000,000 kronen; and the district banks with 210,000 members and one-half billion kronen in deposits.

The city workers' cooperative bank, patterned after the Schulze-Delitsch workers' banks of Germany, were introduced about 1870, and by 1917 numbered 902 banks. Since the war their growth has been rapid, reaching 1,450 banks on January 1, 1921, with 1,500,000 deposits, a capital of 50,000,000 kronen, and about 100,000,000 kronen in the reserve funds.

I think the figures "1,500,000 deposits" are a clerical error.

For the purpose of unifying the financial strength of the local credit societies, the general cooperative bank was established at Prague July 1, 1920. Its capital is now 5,000,000 kronen and its deposits more than 20,000,000 kronen.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Ladd in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator is now speaking of cooperative banks as they are operated in Germany. Is the Senator advised as to whether or not those cooperative banking institutions during and since the war have served the farming community satisfactorily?

Mr. BROOKHART. Let me correct the Senator slightly. I was speaking of Czechoslovakia at that particular time. I may say in answer to the Senator's question, I have a large amount of information on that subject to the effect that those banks are really serving the farmer's needs. The banks are controlled by the farmers themselves through the cooperative system; their reserve is controlled by the farmers themselves; so that they have the right to say how the credit shall be used, and while the banks back every kind of productive enterprise they also kill off every kind of speculative enterprise.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator how they were enabled to obtain sufficient capital to support the enterprises, or back the enterprises, to use the Senator's expression, which are promoted in the respective districts? We all know that Czechoslovakia, under the wise administration of President Masarak, perhaps is forging ahead more rapidly than any other country of Europe to-day, measured by its resources and its size and its population. However, Czechoslovakia during the war was inundated by the warring factions; first, the armies of Austria-Hungary would pass over it and then some parts of it were inundated by the Russian forces, and it was greatly devastated. I was wondering how, rising on the ruins of the past, it was able so quickly to supply funds and how its farmers were able out of the ruins of their country so quickly to organize the banks and companies referred to by the Senator and supply the needed capital for themselves and those who joined the associations.

Really, if the plan has worked there, it is a tribute to the genius of the plan, to its efficiency, and to its effectiveness as well as to the people who have put it into operation and who are controlling it.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the elements suggested by the Senator are all included. I think the big element is the efficiency and, you might say, the magic of the plan itself. You see, all of our business development is backed, after all, by the little deposits collected by little people here and there and everywhere; and in the cooperative system these little people are simply obtaining managers of their own, and controlling their own finances through banks and various enterprises in that way.

Take the great Rochdale system in England, which is the greatest of all. All that vast capital has been furnished by laboring men in little amounts. They buy 1 share of stock, 2 shares, or 10 shares, whatever their savings will permit. By combining them all together they not only have this vast volume of deposits for use in their business, but they are the owners of all that stock, also. In our country we could develop it much more rapidly than any other country if the capitalists would assist us in doing it. They would only have to submit to two propositions to do that. One is that capital should have its wages fixed, the same as men, and the other is that one man should have one vote in all these enterprises, and that capital should not vote. Those are the two basic principles of co-operation, whether in a bank, a factory, a shop, a coal mine, or whatever it may be; and those principles are governing and conducting and carrying on every line of business in the world to-day. I think you can hardly name anything that they are not doing now, and doing successfully, on the cooperative plan. Not only that, but they are more enterprising than private business; they are more progressive; they are more philanthropic; they do everything in the spirit of the advancement of human civilization better than the corporations ever have done anywhere in the world.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. KING. I want to inquire whether, from the Senator's investigations, he has discovered that there have been any centralizing tendencies there which have eliminated the smaller units, the smaller holders, and concentrated in fewer hands year by year the assets, the stocks, the surplus, and so forth, of these organizations?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes. In the Rochdale system the units have all grown to a size dictated by the greatest efficiency. They never compete, you understand. They always cooperate or affiliate one with another. That is one of the basic principles of cooperation. They are never fighting each other. If there are two or three cooperative enterprises running in the same line and they decide that it is more economical, more efficient, to combine them into one, that is done. They all go in on the same cooperative idea. If we had in the United States the cooperative plan we would have no need for anti-trust laws. The restriction that the capital earnings should be only the usual interest rate and that one man should have only one vote are much more far-reaching than any anti-trust laws that can be conceived.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. In response to the question of the Senator from Utah about the possibility of a few associated in these cooperative organizations getting control of the whole institution, that is prevented, that is made impossible by reason of the very basis of the true cooperative principle; namely, that every member has a vote, no matter how much stock he holds. The member holding one share has just the same vote and voice in the management of the affairs of the association as the member holding a thousand shares, so that there is no danger of centralizing control in a few people who may hold a majority of the stock. Is not that the fact?

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the Senator is absolutely correct; and there is no guaranty equal to that.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves the question of these cooperative banking organizations I want to ask him this question: We have here a bill which in its nature is very similar to the operation of the War Finance Corporation in relation to the cooperative farm organizations; but, if you will notice, in this bill the farmers are permitted to organize these cooperative organizations, and are exempt by statute from the operation of the Sherman anti-trust law, and yet when it comes to the question of controlling the very vital principle that was hoped to be enlarged or made operative—namely, the principle of marketing and sharing in the profits that would accrue from proper marketing—under the operation of this law and under the operation of the War Finance Corporation those who hold the purse-strings of the credit can determine the time and quantity and manner in which the cooperative organization may dispose of its holdings. I should like to know if the Senator thinks there is any benefit whatever to the cooperative organizations in this country if it is left discretionary with the financial institutions that we set up ostensibly to help them if we leave with those financial institutions, with their close connection with the great banking system of this country, discretion as to how and under what terms they will let this money go?

Mr. BROOKHART. I should say that the chance of any substantial benefit was very small indeed. I believe that the banking organizations, with here and there notable exceptions, are opposed to the cooperative idea, and I think they tolerate it and encourage it only as they are practically forced to do so. This bill is not a farm bloc bill at all; it is a bankers' bloc bill. I think there is no question about that. It deals with bankers, and leaves the power in their hands, exactly as it is now.

Mr. SMITH. I was very much disappointed to find that one of the cooperative associations that had organized in a great number of States to market a great product in this country has utilized the War Finance Corporation for its loans, in part, at least. I have not seen the contract, but I am confident that I am approximating the terms of that contract in the following statement: The cooperative marketing units throughout the several States having charge of this farm product signed an agreement or entered into a contract that in consideration of the loan extended by the War Finance Corporation, or other financial institutions that provided them with money through the influence of the War Finance Corporation, they obligated themselves to dispose of one-eighth of the pooled product a month, regardless, of course, in a manner, of the law of supply and demand or the price. I believe it was admitted that one of the units that did not sell an eighth each month must, when its attention was called to it, upon notice, sell at that time the deferred amount in sufficient quantity to constitute an eighth. Under such conditions the cooperative concern was in a worse situation than the individual, because the individual might negotiate a loan, hold his stuff, and sell it within the time of his loan in such quantities and for such sum as he saw fit. If, however, the cooperative concern must enter into a contract that they must dispose of an eighth, or an average of an eighth, each month, all that the buyer of that article and those who desire to speculate in it would have to do would be, by manipulation, to depress the market and get the article at the depressed price.

In addition to that, in the rehabilitation of the War Finance Corporation we provided for a 12 months' loan. Our idea—because I was very industrious in trying to get a rehabilitation of the War Finance Corporation act, believing as I did that under the conditions we had to set aside and specifically name some kind of a fund that would be available for agriculture alone—was that there should be a 12 months' extension of time in which the borrower might dispose of his holdings, and we so specified in the bill; but under the form of this contract the borrower had only eight months, because, if he disposed of an eighth each month, at the end of eight months he would have disposed of his entire holdings.

Therefore he was obligated to stand in the presence of his commercial enemy, so to speak—the buyer, who naturally wanted to get his product as low as possible—with it known of all men that he had to dispose of an eighth of his product each month, and all of it in eight months, four months less time than we intended to give him. There is the danger of inviting agricultural cooperative organizations to be formed and then not providing some system by which they can get the full benefit in the sale and management of their product when they have produced it.

I shall have more to say about this matter later on; but I just wanted to call the attention of the Senator to what is actually in operation now under the form of relief that we have attempted to extend to the farmer in such bills as this.

Mr. BROOKHART. I quite agree with what the Senator says upon that proposition; and I can cite one additional instance in my own State. The farmers out there organized, with the help of the bankers, a finance corporation. It was not cooperative, because we had no law for it, so we followed the plan of the locomotive engineers' cooperative national bank and adopted cooperative by-laws. The bankers have entirely abandoned it now. The War Finance Corporation arranged at first to do business with it, and then turned around and said they must get the approval of the bankers' committee out in Iowa before they would make loans for them or transact business with them. The result was that it could not function and has not functioned to any extent through the War Finance Corporation, although it had a million dollars of good capital paid in, as solid as any capital ever was in the world.

Now we come back to this credit system. It is going to work in the United States as it has everywhere else when the farmers get a cooperative system which they control and are able to say how credit shall be used. Then we will have loans for three years if we want them, or for one year if we want them. We will have the system fit the farming business, because farmers will be determining the rules under which those loans are made. At the present time the rules are being determined by those who want rapid, sudden turnovers, big profits, and big earnings for a few stockholders.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will yield, I presume the Senator will analyze the amendment which he has offered, and discuss it; and if he intends doing that, I shall pretermit the asking of a question I have in mind; but I suggest it now, so that when he comes to it he may answer it if he thinks proper. I was wondering why the Senator, with his firm belief in cooperation and entertaining the views which he has expressed, which I think are quite rational and in conformity with commercial laws and our industrial system, attempted to attach his amendment to the national-bank law, because, as the Senator knows, the national banks have many limitations placed upon them, especially as to time. Their paper is all commercial. The theory is that they are commercial banks, and what the Senator designs is to extend the credit to the farmers under this cooperative banking system for indefinite periods, such periods as will help them in their undertakings. If the Senator attaches it to the national-bank system per se, then will he not be hampering the execution of his plan and limit the period of credit in the plan which he proposes to the periods of credit provided in the national banking law?

Mr. BROOKHART. Is there a period provided by statute?

Mr. KING. If not, at least by custom.

Mr. McKELLAR. By banking usage.

Mr. KING. The theory of liquidity is paramount and dominating; the paper must always be liquid.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think that is true; but I was under the impression that it was a regulation of the banks and not provided by statute.

Mr. KING. I am inclined to think the Senator is right.

Mr. BROOKHART. But I want to call the Senator's attention to this: If new banks are organized under this amendment—a thousand of them, we will say—they will then organize their own reserve, also cooperative, and the talk of liquidity disappears. New people who will have a different idea of what is liquid will be in control, and those people will be farmers or those representing farmers' ideas of things. I insist that the same idea should go into the Federal Reserve system by having three farmers put on the Federal Reserve Board, or three men representing farmers' ideas. I also insist that labor is entitled to two members on that board for the same reason. That would change some of these rules. I insist all the time that that regulation is an arbitrary thing, and, being arbitrary, it ignores the greatest business in the United States—the agricultural industry.

It is said they want funds to pay off the deposits; but if a bank is solvent and sound, even though its deposits may be in the bank for only six months, many loans will be for that time, too; but as deposits go out others come in, and the fact that a loan is for three years does not endanger the bank or the deposits or anything else, except that this commercial idea that you must have a three months' turnover or a 30 days' turnover has distorted the idea of business and the view of people upon that proposition. The farmer has wakened up to that and sees and knows now the advantage to him in having a turnover that will fit his business, and I say that he is here demanding it and is demanding it all over the United States.

Mr. President, I desire now to go further into the organization of cooperative credit throughout the world. It is a wonderful story. It is the most hopeful story in the world. I think it is the one chance to settle all this unrest in the world. Perhaps more can be said for Denmark because of cooperative organization than any other country in the world.

Denmark acted on a little different principle from the English. In England the cooperative idea grew of its own force and its own power; it had no help of government at any time; it had to fight its way against the competitive system. It had to fight its way against unfavorable laws and regulations for a long time, and in the face and in spite of that it has won out. Its growth under those conditions was necessarily very slow.

In Denmark the story is different. In Denmark the farmers went in and elected a majority of both houses of their congress, and that is what I think they are going to do in this country, with the help of the laboring people. I think that is going to happen pretty soon.

That farmers' government then gave government aid to the cooperative system, and they did in 10 years what it took 50 years to do in Great Britain. I am not going to review the situation in Denmark fully. I want to quote something about their credit system, which is backing these cooperative enterprises.

The farmers have 46 cooperative packing plants in that country, all under their own control, and producing the best packing products in the world. They can outsell our Beef Trust in the competitive markets of the world because their product is better than ours.

They could not succeed in all that, with all of their cooperative marketing and all of their cooperative processing, without also cooperative credit, and that is the phase we are discussing.

I now read from the Locomotive Engineers' Journal for December, 1922:

The great Danish Cooperative Bank of Copenhagen shows a net profit for 1921 of 2,500,000 kroner, or 33 per cent more than the previous year. After paying 5 per cent interest on capital, the Danish Cooperative Bank placed 1,000,000 kroner in its reserve fund and left the balance of its earnings to be distributed to its depositors and customers on a cooperative basis. In addition 701,403 kroner were deducted from the assets of the bank because of falling prices. Besides its central office in Copenhagen, occupying a whole city block, the Danish Cooperative Bank has 47 district branch offices and 59 suboffices throughout the country.

The Danish Cooperative Wholesale Society reports total sales exceeding 210,300,000 kroner for the past year, of which 35,700,000 kroner represents goods produced by the society's cooperative factories. The Cooperative Wholesale is composed of 1,800 local cooperatives with nearly 350,000 members. Even this splendid record is surpassed by the Danish Agricultural Cooperatives, the Milk Distributors' Society, doing a business of 750,000,000 kroner, the Cooperative Cattle Society, 268,300,000 kroner, and the two farmers' purchasing societies a combined turnover of 367,000,000 kroner. The combined business of the Danish cooperative societies reached the huge sum of 1,470,300,000 kroner ($476,900,000 par).

The extensive building program of the Danish cooperators has led them to found their own cooperative cement works, the business of which has increased during the past year by 48,000 casks. The capacity of the works was not only extended to supply the entire domestic cooperative need but large quantities were also exported to the West Indies, Brazil, Africa, and the East Indies by the Danish cooperators.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator if he can give us any figures as to what proportion of the agricultural products of that country are sold through this cooperative system.

Mr. BROOKHART. As I recollect it, it is about 93 per cent, but I would not say that is absolutely accurate. It is a very high percentage, at any rate.

Mr. KENDRICK. Then, I will ask the Senator if he does not believe that such a system would probably give the farmer his best opportunity to have something to say about the price of his own products?

Mr. BROOKHART. I am in absolute accord with that suggestion. Upon that proposition, I will say that I believe one of the greatest troubles with the farmer in peace, as well as in war times, even before the war, was the fact that so much of his product had to be sold, or "dumped," as we say, at harvest time.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I believe it is coming to be understood, and I ask the Senator if it is not his opinion, that the chief difficulty with the agricultural interests of the country to-day is the fact that they buy everything in something at least approaching a fairly well controlled price condition, and sell everything they produce in the same open competition that has prevailed for hundreds of years. In other words, when the sale of its products is involved, agriculture is the only industry operating on a purely competitive basis.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; Mr. President, it is even worse than a competitive basis both ways. The farmer has no voice whatever in fixing the price he will get for his products. It is determined by the particular combinations which exist at the time he must sell. The vast proportion of the farm products must be sold at harvest time every year, because the farmer is not financed to hold his products. That forces more onto the market than the demand; it creates an excess supply, and the farmers' prices are always depressed at that time of the year.

Mr. KENDRICK. Referring again to the prices of Danish products, I understood the Senator to say that they commanded a premium in the markets over similar products in our country.

Mr. BROOKHART. I was speaking of packing products; but I think the same is true of butter and cheese. I am sure it is true of packing products.

Mr. KENDRICK. Does the Senator believe that some of the increased prices is due to this cooperative system of selling?

Mr. BROOKHART. Altogether due to that, because under the cooperative system they have been careful about their grading and standardizing everything with the idea of getting the benefit of the extra value. It has stimulated farming in that way, made it better, and made the farmer more careful than has any other system that has ever been used.

There are 7,000,000 farmers in the United States who are unorganized, we will say, but who are becoming organized. Heretofore each farmer was out for himself, and many of them owing six months' obligations at the bank, all of which they have to pay at harvest time, and in order to settle which they have to dispose of some of their product. As I said, that always brings a big lot of farm products on the market at that time.

Why buys those products? The speculator. Where do they get the money? They get it through our credit system. They will be backed by the Lenroot bill. They are now backed, and would be backed, by the present banking system. They are able to get the money and hold those products and distribute them throughout the year to fit the demand, but at a very greatly advanced price. The farmers lose all of that benefit.

The Agricultural Commission of Inquiry of Congress, which reported a little over a year ago, found that out of the dollar which the consumer pays for farm products the farmer gets 37 cents. That is the official report of a commission appointed by the Congress. In Denmark, under the system controlled by the farmers themselves, out of the dollar which the consumer pays for the products of the farm, the farmer is getting from 72 to 75 cents. The cost of distribution has been reduced that much.

The cost of distribution ought to be less in the United States than it is in Denmark in percentage. Why do I say that? Because so much of our production is large in volume. Our great volume of grain, our great volume of live stock, in comparison to the little chicken-feed stuff of Denmark, ought to cost less in proportion for distribution than does their production over there.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. BROOKHART. Certainly.

Mr. KENDRICK. I want to ask the Senator if he does not believe that before we have proceeded very far in working out the problems of distribution it is going to be necessary for us to have some system under which freight rates applying to the heavy tonnage of agricultural products will be based more nearly upon the value of those products than is the principle applied to-day. In other words, we have every day letters from our constituents showing the ruinous prices they have been compelled to take for their products shipped to market, and also showing in almost every case a situation in which the railroad receives twice as much for the freight on the product as the farmer received for the product itself.

The question I want to ask the Senator is if he is not impressed with the conviction and the belief that some solution of the problem should be found under which the freight might be more nearly based upon the value of the product when it is delivered to the consumer?

Mr. BROOKHART. I think that is true. Of course, it is on that basis somewhat now, but perhaps there ought to be a greater consideration given to the value of the product in making rates than is given now. I am sure that is true. However, there are some other vital questions in the railroad problem. Our volume of farm freights is so very great that unless we can reform the capitalization and management of the roads we are not going to get much reduction in freight rates.

Now, I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that he is treading on dangerous ground when he suggests that freight rates are so high that the farmers have nothing left for their stuff. In pamphlets circulated all over the United States by railroad managers I have been called a Bolshevik, a communist, a socialist, an anarchist, and almost everything else for making a similar statement recently.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that if the farmer were in position to treat his products like other producers or manufacturers treat their products, namely, to add all the cost to the article and then fix his profit, we would have the railroad problem solved so far as farm products are concerned? In other words, if the farmer were so organized, both as to capital and cohesiveness, that he could name the price of his stuff and add the freight to that, so that those who get the product would pay the farmer his price plus a profit plus the freight, we would have had the problem settled. But under present conditions the producer of farm products subtracts the freight from the price, and the farmer loses it. If he had the power to reverse it and add the freight, we would have had the question settled, because the consumer would have had to pay the freight rather than the farmer having to pay it.

Mr. BROOKHART. I believe there is very much in the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, in the first place, in connection with the statement of the Senator from Iowa about the dangerous ground, I think almost everyone who has lately given the subject any thought or attention at all must have come to the conclusion that, without regard to what is thought about it on the part of those who operate the railroads, they have an interest in common with the farmer. If the farmer does not receive something like fair remuneration for his products, he, by that very fact, becomes unable to buy and patronize the roads, and so the only haul or service to the farmer is the one of taking his farm products to market, because he can not buy anything in lieu of that product to be hauled back to him. In one instance which I have recently had reported to me, one of the farmers of my State sold 668 bushels of potatoes for $156. That was his net received for the carload of potatoes. The railway freight on the same carload of potatoes was $276.

Mr. BROOKHART. Was the freight paid before his net or after?

Mr. KENDRICK. It was paid before, of course.

Mr. BROOKHART. He had about as much left as the constituent referred to by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] the other day, who sold his apples and had so little left.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BROOKHART. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not like to remain quiet when these suggestions are made about freight rates first, that the freight rates ought to be changed continually as the value of the property shifts. I would take it that would mean that if the Senator from Wyoming shipped a carload of cattle to Chicago on the 1st of January he would pay a certain freight, and on the 1st of February, with the same kind of shipment, the freight would either go up or down, depending on how much the cattle sold for.

On the other hand, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] suggests that if we had things arranged differently we would have the freight added to the farmer's price, and the consumer would be paying it and the farmer getting the benefit of it.

I do not want to interrupt unnecessarily the Senator's remarks. Perhaps he did not intend to discuss the railroad freight question. But I do want to say that I do not by my silence want to be understood as acquiescing in either one of those propositions. We ought to consider the consumer as well as the producer. We must consider the consumer. The freight question will never be settled right in my opinion until we take out of the railroad valuation proposition the several billions of dollars that have been injected into it from the time we began the railroad business up to the present time. Probably half or nearly half of the alleged value is nothing but water, and ought not to be involved in it. It ought to be excluded entirely.

Mr. KENDRICK. May I say in answer to the statement made by the Senator from Nebraska that I had no such thought in mind as having the freight values follow the valuation literally, but the idea I have entertained for some time in connection with this question is best explained as follows: All over the western country, as the Senator knows, there is a superabundance of different kinds of farm products, fruits, vegetables, and grain, which in many cases remain unharvested and are allowed to decay and waste because, under present conditions, the producers fail to receive in the markets but little, if anything, over and above the cost of production. It is my thought that there might be authority lodged with the Interstate Commerce Commission to use discretion in adjusting rates for emergency purposes so that such products might be marketed to the benefit of the producer, the railroads, and the consumer. Such a plan would not penalize the railroads. It is easily conceivable that it would be to their interest to accept in an emergency the reduced rates in lieu of no business at all. As stated before, further comment is unnecessary to show the real community of interest between the transportation lines and their patrons, and no satisfactory adjustment of the question will ever be found that does not involve this fact in its solution.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, there are certain provisions of the law now that allow that element to be considered to a certain extent. It is also true that in making the rates the value of the commodity is considered now. That has been the rule of rate making for many years. That is a technical question and before I would give a final opinion on it I would want a summary of values and movements and volume and a good many other things that enter into a determination of the question of rate making.

In any event if we had our marketing under cooperative control we could give the farmers all over the country advice about their production, about what crop there would be in demand and what the demand would be for it. We would know. We would not depend upon the haphazard system that exists now. When we come to market the crops, if we have our own credit system and our own money under our own control, the cooperative system would hold the products and dispose of them as the demand for them arose. In that way it would prevent the dumping on the market and a general fall of prices every year at harvest time. The farmer would get the benefit of it, whereas at this time the speculator gets the benefit of it, and the speculator in turn is mainly protected by the Lenroot bill or similar credit bills, which are dealing with banks and not with farmers.

Now, I want to go a little further, because I want the Senate to know that there has been a development of the cooperative proposition in the world and in the United States, too. I have been in farm organizations, among the real farmers themselves, and there is little trouble in talking cooperation to them because they have been studying it and they know what it means. The laboring people are beginning to deeply study the same question. It is from a labor journal that I am reading these matters, the journal of the locomotive engineers.

I will next take up Finland, that new country which grew out of the war. With reference to Finland I read as follows:

The rapid extension of the cooperative movement in Finland since the war promises to make it, like Denmark, one of the strongest cooperative countries in the world. Reports received during the past year show a remarkable growth of cooperation in that country, rising from a total of 592 enterprises in 1905 to 3,422 in 1921.

The most significant increases have occurred in the producers' and credit cooperatives. Credit societies in Finland have increased from 140 to 775 during the above period; dairy societies, from 225 to 515; societies for the purchase of agricultural machinery, from 4 to 333; cooperatives for fuel supply, from 7 to 195. Other agricultural societies have increased from 50 to 816. Distributive cooperatives have also shown a rapid, though not so striking, growth, from 166 to 788.

In France—

A national cooperative bank has been created at Marseille during 1922, which is known as the Banque des Cooperatives de France. The initial capital of the bank is fixed at 12,000,000 francs, owned by 1,600 cooperative societies and the wholesale organization. Interest on capital stock is limited to 6 per cent, all earnings in excess of which, after meeting the legal reserve, are to be distributed among the shareholding societies in proportion to deposits, as well as interest paid on sums borrowed from the central bank. Its deposits in June, 1922, amounted to 16,287,000 francs from cooperative societies and more than 51,000,000 francs from individuals, groups, and trade-unions.

So Senators see that in France they are establishing not only mutual cooperative banks and credit societies, but the big overhead cooperative societies or reserve banks.

The German Cooperative Wholesale Bank shows a similar progress during the past year. Its turnover increased from 3,361,000,000 to 6,841,300,000 marks, its deposits likewise doubling to 211,900,000 marks and its assets to 3,440,000,000. Even with the present low value of the mark, this tremendous business indicates the great power of cooperation in restoring the economic life of Germany on a democratic cooperative basis.

As to Japan—

The amazing growth of cooperation in Japan is indicated by the Eighteenth National Congress of Cooperative Societies held in July in Tokyo, which brought together 12,000 delegates, representing 2,850,000 cooperators throughout the country. The detailed report of the congress shows that there are now 13,770 cooperative societies in Japan, grouped in 178 district federations. A majority of these cooperatives are peasants and workers' banks or credit unions. These people's banks not only handle money and furnish credit for workers and farmers but also mobilize the funds of the people under their own control for their use in cooperative productive enterprises as well as consumers' stores. The congress passed a resolution declaring for a central cooperative bank in Tokyo.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BROOKHART. I do.

Mr. SWANSON. I wish to submit a request for unanimous consent, and in order that it may be presented I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I desire to offer a request for unanimous consent. I have submitted the proposal to most of the Senators interested in the pending bill who contemplate speaking on it, and I am satisfied, after talking with them, that probably all who desire to speak may find time to do so between now and 4 o'clock Friday afternoon. I therefore offer for the consideration of the Senate the proposed unanimous-consent agreement which I send to the desk in the hope that the Senate may enter into the agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request for unanimous consent presented by the Senator from Virginia will be stated.

The reading clerk read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day Friday, February 2, 1923, the Senate will proceed to vote without further debate upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States, etc., through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition, and that in the time intervening no other legislation shall be considered by the Senate unless unanimous consent is first given therefor.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I should like to say that, in addition, it is understood, though it is not necessary to put it in the agreement, that on Friday there will be a motion to take a recess or to adjourn, as Senators on the other side who have charge of legislation may think proper, to 12 o'clock on Saturday, and that on Saturday at not later than 4 o'clock an adjournment will be taken until 12 o'clock on Monday, so that the calendar may be considered on that day.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As to the last portion of the statement of the Senator from Virginia that on Saturday at not later than 4 o'clock the Senate shall adjourn, I should not desire to have that limitation provided, but let it be understood that the Senate will adjourn on Saturday when it concludes its business for that day.

Mr. SWANSON. I understood that the Senate would probably adjourn about 4 o'clock on Saturday afternoon.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know how long the Senate may desire to continue in session on Saturday. It is desired to take up the Army appropriation bill and to proceed with it as far as we can.

Mr. SWANSON. On Saturday, at any rate, whether at 4 o'clock or 5 o'clock, an adjournment will be taken to 12 o'clock on Monday, so that the calendar may be considered on that day.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, am I to understand, if the pending bill is disposed of on Friday, Saturday will be what might be termed a normal session?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It will last into the afternoon the usual length of time?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. And an adjournment will then be taken until Monday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to entering into the agreement proposed by the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I very much regret that the Senator has not provided in his proposal that after a given hour a Member may speak, say, five minutes upon any amendment that is pending or that may be offered. It is possible that there may not be any offered; but it is a very great handicap to a Senator who wants to propose an amendment to be obliged to do so after debate is absolutely closed, with no opportunity to explain it; or, if some one else proposes an amendment, he may desire to offer an amendment to that amendment or to offer a substitute for it, and yet he has absolutely no opportunity to explain his amendment or his substitute. I have seen that contingency arise here a number of times.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to such a modification. Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to suggest an amendment to the effect that after 1 o'clock on Friday all speeches shall be limited to five minutes.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LODGE. If the vote is taken that day.

Mr. LENROOT. And conclude the consideration of the bill that day.

Mr. HEFLIN. At 4 o'clock.

Mr. FLETCHER. That does not change the hour.

Mr. NORRIS. I would rather have that than have nothing, but I should like to make this as a suggestion: I should be willing to commence sooner, if no one objects. I should be willing to say that, beginning at 12 o'clock Friday, all speeches shall be limited to five minutes, and let it run itself out; then include the condition which the Senator from Florida mentioned, and agree, as the Senator from Wisconsin says, that we will conclude the bill before we adjourn.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection. I think that will be agreeable.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That would meet the objection I have offered, but I think the limitation should not begin, say, before 1 o'clock. The possibilities are that we will not meet until 12; and if we put the limitation at 2 o'clock, in all probability the debate will have exhausted itself before 3 o'clock—certainly before 4—and it would not delay the matter of getting a vote on Friday afternoon.

Mr. NORRIS. No; here is what will probably happen; it almost always does happen. There are exceptions to it, and this may be one of them; but the thing I object to is that when we fix a final time to vote there are a dozen amendments offered afterwards, and a Senator who wants to vote conscientiously and fairly on those amendments is absolutely prohibited from doing so because no consideration can be given to them and no explanation can be made of them. To be sure, they are read by the Secretary, but usually, when that time comes, everybody knows that there can be no debate, no explanation, and there is confusion in the Chamber and we can not even hear the amendments read. If we postpone this until 2 o'clock before the five-minute rule begins, it will probably run too late. The probabilities are that there will be general debate up to the time either of a final vote on the bill or up until the agreement to commence under the five-minute rule. If it is 2 o'clock, it will run too late. The general debate will be considerable. Let us say, then, that all speeches after 2 o'clock on Friday will be limited to five minutes and that the Senate will take a recess on Thursday until 11 o'clock on Friday—that will meet all the propositions—and that we will conclude the bill and vote finally before we adjourn on Friday.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is all right.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is agreeable to me, Mr. President.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that I think his modification is not quite clear. He made the statement that all speeches after 2 o'clock should be limited to five minutes. I assume he meant all speeches on the bill or on any amendment that might be presented.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and, of course, that will entitle a Senator to speak on every amendment, if he wants to. It does not exclude that.

Mr. SWANSON. Now, may the Secretary state the unanimous-consent agreement as amended?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the proposed agreement as amended.

The reading clerk read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on the calendar day of Friday, February 2, 1923, the Senate will proceed to vote upon the bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and livestock industries of the United States; to amend the Federal farm loan act; to amend the Federal reserve act; and for other purposes, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition, and that after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than five minutes upon any amendment offered thereto; and that in the time intervening no other legislation shall be considered by the Senate unless unanimous consent is first given therefor.

Mr. NORRIS. And that on Thursday the Senate will take a recess, when it concludes its business, until 11 o'clock on Friday.

Mr. SWANSON. That can be understood. There is no use of including that.

Mr. NORRIS. That is understood, is it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I was going to suggest that we might understand that if any Senator would like to have us recess to 11 o'clock, in order to get more time, we would do it, but if nobody desires it we would not bind ourselves to do it.

Mr. KING. That is better.

Mr. SWANSON. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. JONES of Washington. On Thursday evening if any Senator expresses a desire to meet at 11 o'clock the next day, in order to have more time, that would be all right.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. That understanding is agreeable to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands, then, that all reference to voting at 4 o'clock comes out.

Mr. SWANSON. No.

Mr. NORRIS. No; there is not any limit of time.

Mr. LENROOT. We are to vote on that calendar day; no hour is named.

Mr. SWANSON. No.

Mr. KING. Why, of course, that is to be eliminated.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand, the unanimous-consent agreement is that we shall vote at 4 o'clock, but that commencing at 1 o'clock debate shall be limited to five minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. KING. No; that is to be eliminated.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to that, if we dispose of it upon that calendar day.

Mr. KING. Commencing at 2 o'clock, the speeches are to be limited to five minutes upon the bill or any amendment; and if the debate proceeds beyond 4 o'clock it shall so proceed, but shall be completed that calendar day.

Mr. LODGE. But it shall be voted on on that calendar day.

Mr. SWANSON. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. NORRIS. We shall vote on it on that calendar day.

Mr. KING. Absolutely.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the agreement again, so that there may be no misunderstanding.

The reading clerk read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on the calendar day of Friday, February 2, 1923, the Senate will proceed to vote upon the bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and livestock industries of the United States; to amend the Federal farm loan act; to amend the Federal reserve act; and for other purposes, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition, and that after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than five minutes upon any amendment offered thereto; and that in the time intervening no other legislation shall be considered by the Senate unless unanimous consent is first given therefor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to ask whether there is any significance to the word "first" in the last clause of the proposed agreement—in other words, whether we would have to get unanimous consent to consider a bill without any explanation of the necessity for considering it? I think we had better leave out the word "first," and have it read "unless unanimous consent is given therefor."

Mr. SWANSON. I do not object to the word "first" going out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to entering into the unanimous-consent agreement as stated by the Secretary? The Chair hears none, and the unanimous-consent agreement is entered into.

The agreement is as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on the calendar day of Friday, February 2, 1923, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and livestock industries of the United States, etc., through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than five minutes upon any amendment offered thereto; and that in the time intervening no other legislation shall be considered by the Senate unless unanimous consent is given therefor.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, this agreement having been made, I wish to state that I shall not ask the Senate to sit in an evening session.

REGULATION OF COTTON INDUSTRY.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think the understanding was that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] should finish his remarks now; but since he has been interrupted thus far, I want to ask him if he will not permit me to report a resolution and ask for its consideration at this time?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, some time ago the Senate passed a resolution directing the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to make certain investigations in regard to the cotton situation. Among other things, they were authorized to use any means or any instrumentality they saw fit in making that investigation. The committee, after due consideration and considerable investigation, reached the conclusion that they wanted that investigation made by the Federal Trade Commission, and in the judgment of the committee the resolution that passed the Senate did not give to the commission sufficient authority; so I have been directed by the committee to report back to the Senate a resolution asking that this investigation be made by the Federal Trade Commission. I report the resolution and submit a report (No. 1078) thereon, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The READING CLERK. From the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, the Senator from Nebraska reports favorably the following resolution (S. Res. 429):

Resolved, That for the purpose of providing the Congress with information to serve as a basis for such legislation as may in its opinion be found necessary for the regulation of the cotton industry, the Federal Trade Commission is authorized and directed to investigate (in pursuance of the powers conferred upon it by subdivision (d) of section 6 of the act entitled "An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes," approved September 26, 1914, as amended, and in pursuance of any other power conferred upon it by such act) the facts relating to (a) alleged corporate violations of the antitrust laws with respect to operations in cotton, including conduct of cotton exchanges, and operations upon such exchanges by corporations, partnerships, and individuals; (b) the effect, if any, of such operations in future contracts upon the price of spot cotton sold in interstate or foreign commerce; and (c) the relation to such antitrust-law violations of the demand for cotton and the supply and methods of marketing it in interstate and foreign commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

The resolution was considered by the Senate and agreed to.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13696) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

I do not ask for action upon it at this time, but that it may lie on the table.

The report was ordered to lie on the table.

RURAL CREDIT FACILITIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States, to amend the Federal farm loan act, to amend the Federal reserve act, and for other purposes.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I regret very much that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has withdrawn his statement that he will ask for night sessions. I counted a great deal on those, but I suppose they will not be held now.

The Senator seemed to question the statement that any farmers were supporting this cooperative banking idea. I have this letter, dated to-day:

WASHINGTON OFFICE NATIONAL FARMERS' UNION,
January 31, 1923.

Hon. S. W. BROOKHART,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BROOKHART: The National Farmers' Union and a number of other farmer groups closely associated with us in effort for the common good are strongly in favor of agricultural cooperative banks. Any effort that can be made to express our deep-seated convictions upon this matter will not only be appreciated but will also be helpful in arriving at the solution of what we believe has become one of the paramount questions among farmers.

By cooperative banks we mean banks which under State or National law will function in the interest of the legitimate objects which are recognized as belonging to the well-trying-out efforts of agricultural cooperation. Railroads, meat packers, and other great manufacturers, merchants, and many others long ago learned that they must protect their interests by entering into banking arrangements where by outright stock ownership or interlocking sympathies they could protect themselves against financial embarrassment.

In the resolution adopted by our national convention at Lynchburg, Va., November 23, 1922, less than three months ago, our delegates, in part, said:

"In order that the farmers may be enabled to control their own credit it is imperative that they institute their own banking system, through which that credit can be utilized and converted into bank credit. Therefore we recommend that cooperative agricultural banks be established in every agricultural State in sufficient numbers to carry on the agricultural business of the country."

This determination of the farmers to go into banking as a means to further the business of agriculture and with it to insure prosperity to all is no more startling than was the farmers' idea for parcel post so strenuously fought by certain vested interests and now so universally accepted with no objections from any source.

Since our national convention at Lynchburg I have traveled approximately 14,000 miles, visiting farmers' meetings and conventions in over 30 States. Everywhere I found the feeling deepening in favor of cooperative banking, and, furthermore, I observed action leading toward that end. Farmers have become quite fearful that without banking facilities of their own there can be brought upon them again without warning a repetition of the terrible experience of the deflation which they have recently undergone. Only Federal legislation which is basely remedial and which frankly recognizes agriculture as of fundamental importance to the Nation will be welcomed by the thinking farmer.

Needless to say, we are in entire sympathy with your efforts to clarify the legislative mind regarding the subject of agricultural credit.

If Congress would look into the hearts and minds of the people they would often find a variance between what is lying deep and powerful beneath the surface and what is floating upon the current or washed in by the tide.

Sincerely yours,

C. S. BARRETT.

P. S.—I attach herewith a copy of the report of our committee of the National Farmers' Union as adopted at Lynchburg.

C. S. B.

In conclusion, I want to say that the farmers of the United States, in asking the Congress for an amendment like this, are asking nothing but permission to organize their own funds under their own control. They are not asking anything that would compel anybody to do anything. It is for permission merely to do something.

This is not a wild and extravagant idea. It is nothing new. It is something that is world-wide, something that has been tried out, and has been successful wherever tried. Is this Congress going to deny to the 7,000,000 farmers of the United States the right to do this simple thing with their own banking organizations? I think they will not when they really understand the situation. I think when they appreciate what it means to agriculture, what it means to cooperative development, the amendment will be accepted, even by the Senator from Wisconsin, and then we will not have to have any trial about who belongs to the farm bloc.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. BROOKHART. I am glad to yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Several times in the course of his address the Senator has mentioned the farm bloc. I am ignorant, perhaps, but I do not know what the farm bloc is, or who it is, and I wondered if the Senator would not enlighten me as to what constitutes the farm bloc; and, if it is a group of Members of Congress, tell us who they are and what their avowed purpose is. I come from a State that is very important in agricultural production, but I do not remember receiving any invitation to meet with this farm bloc, or to cooperate with them, and I would be much obliged if the Senator would enlighten us on those things.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me just a moment?

Mr. BROOKHART. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator from Pennsylvania says he comes from an agricultural State. I recently read an advertisement published in one of the papers in his city by a farmer who wanted a man who could milk and drive a Ford.

Mr. BROOKHART. That may be a good definition of a farm blocker in Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. I say, I saw that advertisement in a Pittsburgh paper.

Mr. BROOKHART. Oh, yes; in Pennsylvania.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator from Pennsylvania was so anxious to know what the farm bloc was, I was just showing the kind of farmers they have in Pennsylvania. I read that in an advertisement in a Pennsylvania paper.

Mr. BROOKHART. I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that he had better look up that farm bloc out in his State. If he does not, he might have a chance to see somebody else in the Senate some of these days, because this farm bloc means business, and there are a lot of them in Pennsylvania.

As for the members of that bloc in the Senate, I would be glad to give the Senator an invitation, as far as I can, to come into the farm bloc. I want to see everybody in the farm bloc and the labor bloc. I also belong to the soldier bloc myself, and those, together with the mothers' bloc, are the principal blocs in this country. I think there are enough in those blocs to entitle them to elect a majority of Senators and Representatives, and I think they are going to do it in the very near future. So the Senator has asked a question of a good deal of importance, and I hope he will look it up quickly and become informed upon that proposition.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I suppose the Senator's words about my reelection should strike terror to my heart, but as that occurrence is some six years distant I beg leave to postpone my shivers for a few years.

I call the Senator's attention to the fact that he has not answered either of my questions, except that he has told us that he is in the farm bloc.

Mr. BROOKHART. What were the other points of the question?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I would like to know who else is in the farm bloc, and I would like to know what the farm bloc is and what its avowed purpose is. From some remarks the Senator has dropped I infer that it is to promote legislation favoring the farmer. We are all in favor of that. We want the farmer to get a square deal. Does the farm bloc propose that he shall get more than a square deal? I would like to have the Senator answer those questions.

Mr. BROOKHART. As far as the members of the farm bloc are concerned, I have no roster of it and I can not name them all. I met quite a lot of them at the office of the Senator from Kansas awhile ago, and they seemed to be pretty good farm blockers.

As to the purpose of this farm bloc, 40 per cent of the people of the United States are farmers. As things are organized in the United States now, they have little voice in either its economic affairs or its political affairs. The farmer has no voice in the price he receives for his product. Farmers are the greatest capitalists in the country, taken collectively. They have around $80,000,000,000 invested in great agricultural enterprises. They have no voice in fixing the price of the supplies they must buy for their business. Bankers fix their rates of interest and manufacturers fix the price they must pay for their machinery.

The price he will receive for his product is being fixed by the boards of trade and the gamblers and the speculators, and he has no voice in any of that. The farmer can add in no cost of production. The farmer can add in no profit. The farmer works without assurance of any wage.

I want to say that the farm bloc means to join with the other producing labor of this country, 35 per cent more of the people of this country, and then perhaps about 15 per cent more who also earn their living by brain work, as honest a living as hand work. They, too, are in the same condition. They, too, are discriminated against by the great organizations of capital in the United States.

We see combinations of capital able to charge whatever profit they choose to charge. They never ask the farmer, they never ask the laborer, they never ask the common people of this country. They accumulate their profits in great surpluses and then declare enormous stock dividends in order to avoid the payment of their income taxes.

I want to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the farm bloc, the labor bloc, the common soldier bloc, and the mothers' bloc of this country mean to have equal rights and equal economic and equal political power with these other combinations, which are now able to put this overhead charge upon the people of this country with such power, both politically and economically, that it amounts to taxation without representation. Have I made myself clear?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator has declared in favor of equality among these various occupations; but all of us believe in that. Every member of both parties believes in equality of opportunity, equality of burdens, and equality before the law. If that is what the farm bloc represents, then, Mr. President, we will all belong to the farm bloc. Both Democrats and Republicans realize that the farmer has borne the brunt of the adjustment after the war. Both Democrats and Republicans want to help as far as legislation properly can help; and I am wondering whether the Senator does not ascribe to himself, and perhaps to some of his colleagues, a monopoly of good intentions, which are shared, in fact, by all of us. If any occupational group is protected to-day in the United States so that it is given special privileges, we are all agreed that it ought to be struck down, that that special privilege ought to be ended. I am wondering if the Senator is not describing the whole Senate when he is trying to describe his own feelings toward the farmer's present distress.

But if the Senator means that Congress, or the Senate of the United States, is to be divided up into occupational groups—groups owing allegiance to persons following particular occupations—so that we will have farmers' Senators and dentists' Senators and railroad men's Senators, and groups of that sort, then I hope the day will never come when the Senate shall become a soviet of that description. It has been tried in Russia; the experiment has been given a full trial, and it has collapsed with the collapse that is inevitable for any such effort.

Mr. BROOKHART. Let me ask the Senator a question. If he is in favor of all this equality, is he not in favor of giving the farmer a chance to organize a cooperative national bank, the same as any other banker?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am in favor of giving the farmer an equal right with any other citizen to organize any kind of a bank, of course. He has it to-day, if I correctly understand our law.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then the Senator will vote for my amendment providing for cooperative banks.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do not expect to vote for the Senator's amendment, because I think it outlines a peculiarly dangerous method of bank organization, which has been tried by the Non-Partisan League in North Dakota, if I understand their history, and in each case with failure. I might say, since the Senator has mentioned the subject, that I do not think he could get any sane man to subscribe to the capital stock of such a bank as is described in his amendment if their return is limited to the legal rate of interest in case of the success of their enterprise, and they lose their capital in case of its failure. I do not see why in the world anybody would put money in the stock of such an organization, when he can get a legal rate of interest, and get it surely, by lending money on a mortgage.

Mr. BROOKHART. I regret more than ever that our night school of cooperation has been killed by this unanimous-consent agreement. I believe the Senator is not a hopeless case, but it will take some time to explain the cooperative principle to him.

In the first place, that has not been tried in North Dakota, and I am sorry the Senator from North Dakota is not present. The only fellows who are in the way of it are the nonpartisan league of Wall Street. They are the fellows who are not willing to give us a chance. If the Senator's observations are correct, there would be no bank organized under this law, and it would do no harm; yet I have just read a letter from one of the greatest farm leaders in the United States, a man who has talked cooperation to perhaps more people of the United States than any other man in it, a man who has been longer in it and knows what it is, and he would like to have it. Farmers everywhere would like to have it. They have a lot of money now on deposit on which they are getting only 4 per cent interest. They would gladly buy a share of stock that would yield them 6 or maybe 8 per cent. The reason there is a difference between the farm bloc and the capitalist bloc is because the farmer can not earn 3 per cent, or 2 per cent, or 1 per cent, on his investment. They want to hold him down to that rate by this system, and they are not willing even to be limited to 8 per cent in their own business, as I have provided in this amendment they shall be. They want 100 per cent, or 200 per cent, and then declare other hundred per cent stock dividends in order to avoid payment of taxes. The farmer has a complaint, and it is coming, and I do not care whether Senators call it a group or what they call it; the farmers are going to have their voice in this United States and in this Congress. I believe that it is at hand. I believe we can call them groups or what not, but we are going to elect men who will fight for the farmer principles and not raise some technical objection whenever anyone comes forward with something to do for the farmer.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator from Iowa takes his seat may I make a further inquiry, with his permission, with respect to the question which I propounded to him some time ago when he was discussing his amendment?

As I understand the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, it is to amend the national banking law so as to permit cooperative banking associations. I suggest to the Senator now, for his consideration perhaps a little more than he has explained it upon the floor, what difficulty there would be in having the organizations effected under State laws? I am familiar more or less with the general incorporation laws and banking laws of some of the States of the Nation. I think there would be a general disposition upon the part of the States and the people within the States to permit all forms of cooperative enterprise, whether those cooperative organizations dealt with agriculture, agricultural products, the processing, sale, and distribution of the same, or with institutions that might be denominated cognate to them or entirely separate from them.

I can see no objection to a State banking law permitting farmers, laborers, or anybody for that matter, forming cooperative institutions or corporations even to deal with banking. I see no reason why men may not as well be permitted to cooperate to organize a bank and limit the amount to be paid as dividends, as to permit them to organize for the purpose of operating a gristmill or sheep herd or any other legitimate industrial enterprise.

With the power of the States which is plenary over those police and domestic questions and matters, their unlimited power to create corporations, whether for banking purposes or any purpose, why could not the States, if their laws are not sufficiently broad now, change or modify existing statutes to authorize any number of individuals to form cooperative banks under State supervision? Of course, there should be some supervision, either State or National, with respect to all banks.

Now, I think, if the Senator will pardon me, that with the interest which is felt and justly felt in agriculture, in view of the awakened feeling throughout the country that agriculture has not had a fair deal during the past two years, that any reasonable appeal which the farmers might make to the legislatures to amend their corporate laws to permit cooperative bank organizations would be met with a most hearty and ready response by the legislatures.

May I make one further observation? The amendment of the Senator provides for the localization of the resources of a large number of banks. The suggestion may be made that if the State of Iowa, say, should pass a suitable law, one in harmony with the views of the Senator from Iowa, the State of Illinois might interpose obstacles to the unification of the banks of Illinois with the banks of Iowa or other States. I repeat that in my judgment the State of Illinois and other States would modify their laws so as to permit not only the organization, in the first place, of the cooperative banks, but to permit the coordination or unification or consolidation of banks, or merging of their assets even though the assets were in other States and belonged to other corporations.

Does the Senator think, in other words, that there is any insuperable objection to a realization of his desires through State organizations or through State banks organized under State statutes?

Mr. BROOKHART. I do. We have the same reason for having national cooperative banks that we have for any kind of national banks. Why have a national banking system at all? Why not leave it all to the States, on that theory? I am for cooperative banks in the States and under the national banking law both, and I have provided in my amendment that they can cooperate together. A State bank is permitted to affiliate with the national cooperative reserve that is provided for in my amendment. It is simply giving the farmer permission to organize on this basis if he wants to do it. Other business has a right to organize a bank the way it wants to. It is not taking any right away from other business. It is permissive throughout.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator whether the amendment he has proposed has been indorsed by the farm bloc?

Mr. BROOKHART. It has not been presented to the farm bloc.

Mr. LENROOT. Not presented?

Mr. BROOKHART. It came up recently.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it possible such a burning issue as this, which the Senator says is the most important thing for the farmer, was not presented by him to the farm bloc?

Mr. BROOKHART. The idea was presented to the farm bloc at its first meeting and was approved even by Eugene Meyer, who appeared before that meeting. But when we came to get anything done we got the Lenroot bill, which is not a cooperative bill. Does the Senator see the difference?

Mr. LENROOT. Then if the farm bloc has not considered this burning issue, what rural-credit measure has the farm bloc agreed upon?

Mr. BROOKHART. We had too many ship subsidy farm blockers in our meeting, and we were not able to get an agreement on anything. It went to the Committee on Banking and Currency without any farm bloc approval.

Mr. LENROOT. So there are renegades even in the farm bloc?

Mr. BROOKHART. I have not presented the amendment as anything but my own amendment, which is based on what I know of cooperative banking. I have tried to explain it on its merits, and not because somebody held a caucus or a meeting and ruled it in or ruled it out.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator then does not expect that Senators will accept an important measure of this kind as an amendment to the bill?

Mr. BROOKHART. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator does expect that?

Mr. BROOKHART. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. And yet he has not presented it to the farm bloc, which, according to him, has especially in its care the interests of the farmer?

Mr. BROOKHART. There are some Senators in that farm bloc who do not seem to be in it very deep.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President—

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. With reference to the farm bloc, in order that the record may be kept straight, it accomplished some things before we had the benefit of the presence and service of the Senator from Iowa. I regard him as a most important acquisition to the farm bloc, but before he came to the Senate there was such a thing here designated as the farm bloc. I make no claim that the name was properly given or that the designation was entirely such as might have distinguished those who were cooperating on the other side and on this side of the Chamber in respect to measures for the benefit of the agricultural interests of the country.

I want to say to the Senator from Iowa that if it had not been for the so-called farm bloc, if it had not been for the efforts of Senators on the other side and on this side of the aisle, cooperating, not on party lines or with reference to political questions at all, but with reference to measures to meet the needs of agriculture in the country, we never would have passed during this Congress either the packer control bill or the Capper bill for marketing or the bill for the revival or extension of the life of the War Finance Corporation.

None of those things would have been accomplished if it had not been for the unrelenting energy and effort of the members of what was known as the farm bloc. That might as well be written here and now. As the old saying is, we can judge something of the pudding by the eating thereof. We have the results of that movement here in the Senate, and those results, I submit, are sufficient answer to any slurs or aspersions attempted to be cast upon what is known as the farm bloc.

I wanted to say that so the Senator would know that back of the farm bloc, as it may or may not exist to-day—we believe that it still does exist to some extent—is a record of achievement for the benefit of agriculture which never would have been accomplished but for the cooperative efforts of those feeling that agriculture especially needed attention at the hands of Congress.

Mr. BROOKHART. I can fully indorse the statement of the Senator from Florida. The fighting members of the farm bloc like himself and like the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD], and like my distinguished predecessor, former Senator Kenyon, helped to make these things possible. I am proud of the achievements of the farm bloc so far as it has gone. I think the farm bloc is going to be strengthened very materially in the Senate of the United States and in the other House of Congress. I think it is going to command a good deal of respect. It is going to stand for the rights of the farmer and bring him to a position of equality. He has not had that equality.

The sort of bloc that has been ruling in this country has been the Wall Street bloc, the United States Chamber of Commerce bloc, the railroad bloc, the coal bloc, the steel bloc. That is a sort of bloc that has had power in every department of our Government. The farmers are united now for the purpose of seeing that that power shall go. A free government can not exist with a little bunch of blocs of that kind wielding all the power under the Constitution. For that reason the farmer is a potent factor in the situation. He is thinking some on his own account. He is thinking things out from his own viewpoint. He no longer has to ask the banker what is right about credits. He figures it out for himself. He no longer has to ask any of the other enterprises. He is figuring it out in line with the rights of the great agricultural enterprise itself.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I deplore seeing the question of the so-called farm bloc being so misunderstood as the speeches of some Senators seem to indicate. I was one of the four or five who had what I consider the honor of bringing about the organization. The first meeting was held in my office. The object that we had in view then was the object that every proper Representative of his State in part and of the Nation in part on this floor ought to have in mind—that is, fully to understand the basic principles which underlie every great industry and, so far as possible, intelligently to understand the problems and legislate accordingly. I was persuaded then, as I am persuaded now, that the most misunderstood question was and is the question of agriculture as related to the market and as related to the question of profits accruing to the producer. It was necessarily involved in the banking question.

The banking law, which was framed by the best thought we had, was designed to meet the exigencies of all commerce. Of course, the framers of the law included incidentally whatever part of agricultural products went into the commercial system, but as the years went by it became manifest that the law then framed for the accommodation of industry and commerce, under the same administration and under the same rules, did not meet and could not meet the requirements of agriculture. There were other questions, involving production and the markets of the world, which it became apparent were legitimate objects of concentration of thought on the part of those who have been intrusted with legislation. There were men then here whose environment, whose upbringing, and whose associations made them almost incapable of understanding the problem and totally incapable of appreciating it in all of its aspects. It was for the purpose of trying to find the lines along which the best development of agriculture might be assisted so far as national legislation could aid the farmer that the farm bloc was organized. It was not for the purpose of taking away from others certain legitimate rights, but it was for the purpose of defining squarely the natural lines along which agriculture might prosper and enjoy its share of the wealth that it produced. We therefore addressed ourselves to the subject, and we made headway here when there were introduced and enacted certain measures for the benefit of agriculture. We have before us this afternoon such a bill; but I invite the attention of the Senators and the public to a suggestion which after study I am convinced is almost brand new to everyone.

It has been said that it takes 12 months for the turnover of an agricultural investment, but I submit that it takes 24 months. It takes 12 months to produce an agricultural commodity, and it takes 12 months to consume the commodity which has been produced in 12 months. Therefore the farmer has got to be financed for the 12 months which it takes him to produce, but that which he has produced in 12 months constitutes an aggregate to be consumed in the next 12 months. So, when it is said that the farmer has a turnover in 12 months, I wish anyone would cite me to any great staple agricultural product, be it grain, cotton, or wool, that is produced in 12 months and consumed in the same 12 months. So the farmer must have 24 months in order to complete the turnover on his investment.

The manufacturer, on the other hand, will produce every day an amount which is consumed probably the next day. The great absorbing public takes the finished goods, the product of the manufacturers of the country, and daily converts them into consumption, while it takes 12 months for the man in the field to produce a crop which is his finished product, and it takes the following 12 months to absorb it. Therefore when we come to legislate for the farmer and provide a credit of only 12 months, we have simply legislated to enable him to produce, to get into marketable shape an aggregate commodity which it takes the next 12 months to dispose of; and if, after he has had extended to him a 12 months' credit for the production of his crop, liquidation is then forced upon him, he will be left in worse condition than he was in originally, because he has assumed obligations in producing the crop, and when his assets shall be put into commercial form, if he is forced to sell within that 12 months the commodity which he has produced in the same 12 months, the very object for which we are now striving will have been destroyed.

Yet Senators solemnly attempt to pass a bill which proposes to utilize the instrumentality of the farm loan bank system, to put in conjunction with the farm loan bank system or the farm land bank system a commodity system, so that the farmer not only can go to the land banks and get an almost unlimited time loan on his land at a reasonable rate of interest, but we are led to believe that, using that same instrumentality, without setting up any more machinery, we can provide a department of farm-product credits.

What do we find? We have met almost ideally the farm-loan needs of the farmer; we have amortized his indebtedness with the interest and given him 30 years, so long as he pays the interest, in which to liquidate the entire loan in the form of interest. I say we have met the requirements of the land as an asset rather than as a liability in the farm land banks. Now, it is proposed to create a fund to lend the farmer on the product of the land, and a period of nine months has been written into the bill as the limit of credit which will be extended to the farmer in making, harvesting, and disposing of the crop which he produces on the land.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. There is no such provision in the bill as that which the Senator cites. A period of three years is the limit.

Mr. SMITH. As I read the modification which is found on page 17, line 3, the limit is nine months. The clause on page 16, section 3a, where the Federal reserve act is proposed to be amended, specifically provides that—notes, drafts, and bills of exchange issued or drawn for an agricultural purpose, or based upon live stock, and have a maturity, at the time of discount, exclusive of days of grace, not exceeding nine months.

Mr. LENROOT. That is a proposition for amending the Federal reserve act.

Mr. SMITH. That is the point I am getting at.

Mr. LENROOT. But the Federal land bank may loan up to three years.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; but I am speaking about amending the Federal reserve law. In a speech which I made on the floor of the Senate a few days ago I called attention to the fact that the present Federal reserve act should be so amended as to meet the requirements of agriculture. In this bill as it has been framed, although credits based on notes, bills, and drafts for agricultural purposes may be unlimited, yet under the provision to which the Senator from Wisconsin refers the credit is limited to $5,000,000 for each one of the banks, or $60,000,000 in all; and if an emergency arises, $120,000,000 more as a basis to issue debentures, and ten times their capital, or a total of about $1,200,000,000. That is the limitation that is really imposed.

I am speaking now of provision being made by the bill to insure as unlimited credit so far as the farmers' products are concerned as has been provided when his land is used as the basis. The existing Federal reserve act, as I showed the other day, allows 30, 60, and 90 days' credit to ordinary artificial production, and the farmer has been restricted to nine months,

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator will yield to me again, he does not mean we have restricted the farmer, but we have extended the time three months over existing law.

Mr. SMITH. That is true. The limitation has been extended three months, but the aggregate of nine months is as inadequate as the six months was. The point I wish to make is this: The Senator knows as well as I do that under the Federal reserve act commodities, actually existing wealth, become the basis of the issuance of a temporary currency based upon that wealth in order to enable the possessor of that wealth to enjoy a flexible currency and to aid him in meeting his ordinary obligations in the production and disposition of it under the usual marketing methods. So if a manufacturer carries his acceptances liquefied into Federal reserve notes. It does not jeopardize a dollar of the depositor's money; in fact, he gets an additional currency for the length of time that it takes to buy the raw material and convert it and put it upon the market. Then when the commodity shall have been disposed of in final consumption, that amount of Federal reserve notes is retired and canceled.

The farmer who produces wheat or raises cattle or cotton or wool has provided a commodity basis for the issuance of these clearing-house certificates—reserve notes—that should have a length of time to accommodate the peculiar marketing and turnover condition that confronts him. If we can issue Federal reserve notes in order to enable the different branches of industry to manufacture and put upon the market their commodities, whom would we jeopardize, what business is there that we would extract a dollar from, what deposits would we jeopardize if we should make the same provision for the products of agriculture?

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I think I can answer the Senator's question, if he will allow me to do so.

Mr. SMITH. Very well.

Mr. CARAWAY. The business of the man who expects to buy farm products for half what it cost to produce them would be disturbed if farm credit were extended until the producer could realize their worth.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the Senator is right; it is just such facts as that which the Senator from Arkansas has called attention to which are causing certain acts of Congress to be viewed suspiciously in the minds of the toiling masses of this country. Some man has a fortune and has deposited it in banks and trust companies for investment purposes; under the system which we have inaugurated, under which Federal reserve notes are issued, those notes come in competition with privately owned capital, and then pressure is brought to bear to restrict the output of Federal reserve notes issued to encourage expansion and production, thus making high rates of interest possible to private capital and give to it the control of the money market. I submit to the Senate that it is a suspicious circumstance that before the Federal reserve system was three years old, although it had demonstrated its marvelous flexibility and adaptation to capitalize and liquefy the great commercial products of the country, the blighting hand of restriction was laid upon it and Federal reserve notes disappeared from circulation and the producers of wealth were restricted to those who privately owned what is known as lawful money.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator further?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator asked the question, if I understood him, if adequate credit was granted to the producer of agricultural products so that he might hold and market his products in the wisest and best way, who would be hurt? Was not that the Senator's question?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. I tried to suggest that the business of the man who wanted to buy his products at half price would be destroyed to a certain extent if the farmer were given credit enough to carry him until he may sell his products himself.

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought the Senator was taking issue with me.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, no. I said that it was just such questions asked in good faith and embodying a fact that have brought acts of Congress under suspicion.

The Senator from Arkansas asked whose business would be hurt. Now, where we get this matter confused is this: Upon the commodity basis, the issuance of temporary security to accommodate actual existing wealth from the time of finishing it for the market to the sale of it—we have provided in this law that there could be issued a form of currency to take care of that period. I submit that if the farmers of this country produce cotton, wool, and foodstuffs to the value of $1,000,000,000, and the law provides that from the date of production and harvest until the sale and distribution of it, upon its hypothecation in proper form, the farmer may be extended credit in the form of Federal reserve notes, whose money, what volume of currency, is jeopardized? The volume of currency is increased by that much, and there is where the difficulty arises. We say it is expansion. It is a temporary expansion, but a necessary temporary expansion to meet the exigencies of our industrial and productive world.

Why do you want to mulct one of the producers, the greatest individual producer in America—namely, the farmer, with his billions of production each year, necessarily forced to consume 12 months in the production, and another 12 months in the distribution thereof—why do you want to mulct him by trying to force him into the category of an artificial producer who makes a crop every day and disposes of it the next day? He has a right to complain. We say we can not tie up our commercial circulation in long-time paper. The farmer, under the Federal reserve act, produces the basis of the currency that he is asking you to grant him. He produces wealth that can be hypothecated for the issuance of a sufficient volume of currency to take care of his business. Then why restrict him to nine months? What danger is there? Why not extend his paper and allow it to become the basis of the issuance of Federal reserve notes as long as we keep the gold reserve necessary to redeem it?

During this time of deflation we had nearly a billion dollars of what was known as free gold in excess of the outstanding obligations in the form of Federal reserve notes, bank notes, and gold certificates. We had a billion dollars in excess of the 40 per cent required as against circulation, and the 35 per cent required as against deposits; and we can have the gold indefinitely, because we provide in the law that when the gold shall begin to disappear we allow them to put a certain premium on the circulation in order to create a fund to purchase the gold and bring it back, just as the Bank of England and every other banking system based upon a gold reserve does. So I challenge any man on the floor of this body to deny that if we take the Federal reserve system, put it side by side with the customs and practices of England or France or Germany, and honestly adhere to the principle of the Federal reserve law, we will have the most prosperous country on the globe. It is the best adapted to meet the exigencies of production, marketing, and sale of any system that has been devised by civilized people up to the present time; and yet it has been distorted to a point where it became an engine of the most appalling destruction.

I ask the Senator who has the bill in charge, as we are going to amend the fundamental banking and currency law, namely, the Federal reserve law, in place of putting the language that you have in section 13a, "Upon the indorsement," and so forth, "exclusive of days of grace, not exceeding nine months," why not write in "12 months"? I will guarantee that if the Senator has interviewed our board of governors—I have not talked to them, but, knowing something about the banking business and about this law, I will guarantee that there is not one of them who would hesitate between 9 months and 12 months. If he did he could not give you any reason for it; and I am informed—I have not interviewed them—by some of those who are best posted on this matter that those who have charge of our banking and currency laws say that there is no difference so far as concerns its effect upon the so-called volume of currency, or the danger of jeopardy thereto.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator is evidently going upon the assumption that this nine months' paper is eligible for discount only if secured. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that this extension to nine months is made utterly regardless of security. The security is effective and applies only in case it is proposed to issue Federal reserve notes upon that class of paper.

Mr. SMITH. That is the very point I am making. You require certain form of security, but if it is unsecured it has six months.

Mr. KING. It has the member bank's indorsement.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, of course it has the member bank's indorsement. I wish to say to the Senator, as he knows, that the Capper bill provided for the securing in all cases of nine months' paper, any paper in excess of six months.

Mr. SMITH. I know, but the Senator from Wisconsin understands this law sufficiently to know that we do not jeopardize anything except the money in the hands of private individuals when we say that we can not afford to tie up the circulating medium, or jeopardize it, by long-time paper. That was eminently true under the old banking and currency law, for the amount of currency that could be put into circulation was as rigid as a rock. The source, the basis of the issuance of that currency, was so restricted and so limited that we dared not go much beyond 90-day paper, because we might have our actual liquid money tied up in such a form that a panic would be precipitated and disaster would result; but under this Federal reserve law we can not have it, because they have the right, if the circulating medium grows insufficient, to issue to a certain per cent of its value Federal reserve notes during the time of its transformation from the raw into the finished state, or from the date of harvest until disposed of. That is the point I have tried to impress my colleagues with—that we have a flexible system; that we can meet the needs of all business without jeopardizing the volume necessary for any other business. Of course, when we begin to issue these notes, we increase the volume of currency and have a tendency to lessen the rate of interest that private individuals get for the accommodation that they heretofore have extended.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator this question in that connection: Is currency to-day anything more than a mere convenience? In other words, what is the difference between credit and currency, so far as the great volume of transactions are concerned?

Mr. SMITH. Practically none; and we have extended the basis of credit to a point where it is ample if we will use it; that is all. The question which the Senator asks me answers itself. We have made possible the liquefying temporarily of all the commercial products of America, and yet we hesitate to give the proper time on the wealth produced by the farmer. We have failed to recognize that he is producing, under this law, the basis of the issuance of the temporary currency that will take care of his business.

Great as is the need of agriculture, so dependent is every other business upon the farmer's production, that I would hesitate, in the organized form of our commercial industrial life as it is, to grant such length of time for the tying up of capital as would jeopardize all the other forms of business.

We would have to have a distinct system to accommodate the one if by putting them all together one had to die. We would then have to provide for the life of each one separately; but under the possibility of the Federal reserve act it is flexible enough to take care of all, in that it provides that the commodity produced is the basis of the issuance of currency to represent that commodity. If the manufacturer who manufactures 30-day goods wants 30 days, his goods stand for the 30 days, because within the 30 days he has disposed of them and retired the note for the 30 days; if he wants 60 days, then 60 days; but the money that is advanced to him upon the value of his goods is the money based upon the goods that he manufactures, and by the same token why can you not do the same thing for agriculture? Whom do you jeopardize? What volume of currency do you restrict?

Mr. President, I wish some Senator would explain what difficulty would be occasioned to the commercial world by writing into the bill a provision that the producer of wealth that it takes 12 months to produce and 12 months to dispose of should have a 12 months' credit.

It is just such problems as these that called the farm bloc together. I am sure that there is not a Senator here who is uncharitable enough to believe that a majority on this side and on the other side, if they understood the problem thoroughly, would not unite to help solve the problem. I should hate to think that any Senator on this floor would be so bound up in a desire that the little class he might represent should profiteer upon others at the expense of the others that he would not vote for a broad principle that would deal fairly with all.

Mr. President, in view of the fact that I have stated, which no Senator on the floor can contradict, that the agriculturists of this country who produce the basis of credit are entitled to the issuance of that credit for the length of time it takes them to produce and dispose thereof, I am going to move to amend the bill on page 17, line 4, after the word "exceeding," by substituting "12" in place of "9."

Mr. LENROOT. I will say to the Senator that there is an amendment pending now.

Mr. SMITH. I understand that, but I am just giving notice so that it will not be necessary for me to go over this matter again.

I see, Mr. President, that the framers of this bill have added a new section. I want to ask the Senator having the bill in charge if he means that in substitution for or in modification of the second paragraph of section 13 of the Federal reserve act as it now stands?

Mr. LENROOT. What provision does the Senator refer to?

Mr. SMITH. Section 13 of the original bill, which has to do with agricultural loans. The last proviso of the second paragraph of section 13 says:

The notes, drafts, and bills drawn or issued for agricultural purposes or based on live stock and having a maturity not exceeding six months, exclusive of days of grace, may be discounted in an amount to be limited to a percentage of the assets of the Federal reserve bank, to be ascertained and fixed by the Federal Reserve Board.

The Senator is proposing an entirely new paragraph, known as section 13a. The Senator does not mean that that is to be in lieu of the present section 13, because he would not have put in "a" if he had meant that.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator will look at section 10, at the bottom of page 16, he will find that we strike out the fourth paragraph of section 13.

Mr. SMITH. I thought perhaps this amendment was in modification of the same paragraph from which I have read.

Mr. LENROOT. It is.

Mr. SMITH. But in the upper part of that second paragraph the language is as follows:

Upon the indorsement of any of its member banks, which shall be deemed a waiver of demand, notice, and protest by such bank as to its own indorsement exclusively, any Federal reserve bank may discount notes—that is, notes, drafts and bills of exchange issued for agricultural, industrial, and commercial purposes.

That language is almost identical with section 13a as proposed, and yet the Senator does not propose to repeal any portion of section 13. Therefore, it must be in addition to section 13a, untouched.

Mr. LENROOT. I again call the Senator's attention to section 10, which strikes out paragraph 4 and inserts the language therein designated, and then a new section is added.

Mr. SMITH. That is what I mean. The Federal reserve act is to be amended by the insertion of an entirely new section, to be known as section 13a.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. Is that in addition and supplementary to section 13 as it now stands?

Mr. LENROOT. It is.

Mr. SMITH. Very well. Then, at the proper time I shall offer an amendment to section 13 of the present Federal reserve act to strike out the word "six" in the proviso which I have just read—"Provided, That notes, drafts, bills, and so forth, shall have a maturity not exceeding six months"—and insert in lieu thereof "12," so that the section 13 may be harmonious in case the amendment prevails.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, in view of the discussion which has taken place in connection with the so-called Lenroot bill, and in view of the fact that the State of New York stands fifth or sixth, according to my recollection, among all the States of the Union in agricultural production, I beg leave to present for printing in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the New York State Agricultural Society on January 17 last. It is very brief, and I would like to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Resolution adopted at the ninety-first annual meeting of the New York State Agricultural Society, January 17, 1923.

Whereas there is pending in the Congress of the United States legislation looking to the granting of funds from the National Treasury to agricultural enterprises and as an aid to farmers in various parts of the country; and

Whereas there seems to be no satisfactory evidence that ample credit facilities are not already available for those legitimately entitled thereto from sources readily available; Therefore be it

Resolved, That the New York State Agricultural Society records itself as opposed to the legislation now pending, and urges that same be not passed upon favorably by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. COUZENS obtained the floor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Harris	Nelson	Sterling
Brookhart	Heflin	New	Sutherland
Cameron	Jones, N. Mex.	Norbeck	Swanson
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Trammell
Caraway	Kellogg	Oddie	Underwood
Couzens	Kendrick	Overman	Wadsworth
Curtis	King	Page	Walsh, Mass.
Ernst	Ladd	Pepper	Walsh, Mont.
Fernald	Lenroot	Philips	Warren
Fletcher	Lodge	Ransdell	Watson
George	McCumber	Smith	Williams
Gooding	McLean	Smoot
Hale	McNary	Stanfield

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Michigan will proceed.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I would like to take a few moments of the time of the Senate with respect to the so-called Lenroot bill.

I have been informed by Senators who have been here many years that talking upon the floor accomplishes nothing. I am told that all the discussion which takes place on the floor is wasted. But, in spite of that, I am going to have the temerity to say a few words with respect to the pending bill and farm credit legislation in the hope that it may carry some weight at this particular time.

I want to draw the Senate's attention to the fact that by the passage of the so-called Capper bill, which extended the time for rediscounting the farmer's paper and also extended the time of the expiration of the life of the War Finance Corporation, everything was accomplished that was necessary to accomplish at this particular session of Congress. There is nothing provided for in the Lenroot bill that the War Finance Corporation can not do until March, 1924. I desire to point out that in a resolution introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. McLEAN] it is provided that there shall be an investigation as to why a large number of State banks are not members of the Federal reserve system. It is my judgment that when that has been ascertained Congress will be in a much better position to determine what kind of agricultural credit we need than we are in a position to determine now.

Then, again, I want to find some fault with the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which I am a member. Two distinct principles were submitted to the Banking and Currency Committee—one represented by the Lenroot bill and the other represented by the Norbeck bill. The Lenroot bill, as Senators know, provides for a decentralization of the capital which the Government is to put up to finance agriculture. It provides, as Senators will remember, $5,000,000 for each of 12 Federal land banks, with a possible increase to $10,000,000 per bank. The Norbeck bill provides for the capital to be centralized so that it may be distributed by a board wherever agriculture may need it. At the present time, of the 12 Federal land bank districts there are districts where the money is not needed. I want to point out that there would be throughout the entire life of the measure many districts which would never need the extension of credit, as provided in the Lenroot bill. So that, I believe it is better to have the capital, which the Federal Government is to provide out of the Treasury, centralized so that it may be placed where needed by agriculture.

I am not definitely committed to the Norbeck bill, but I contend that the Committee on Banking and Currency gave no hearing and no heed to the Norbeck bill. That committee never gave any heed or consideration to the two distinct policies, one the policy of decentralizing the capital so that it goes to each district, whether it is wanted or not, and the other the system of providing centralization, so that it might be put where it is most needed by agriculture. It seems to me the Banking and Currency Committee were remiss in not properly considering both of the bills because of the two distinct principles involved in the matter of distributing credit for agriculture.

With the extension of the life of the War Finance Corporation until March, 1924, as provided in the Capper bill, agriculture would get everything that it could possibly get under the Lenroot bill. I submit that this Congress is not sufficiently informed as to the best method of providing credit for farmers. I believe that by the time the next session of Congress convenes not only will we have had the full and complete experience of the activities of the War Finance Corporation, but we also will have had the complete experience of the liquidation as to which the country has found so much fault. So I can see nothing lost to the farmer, but a great deal to be gained by Congress in delaying or postponing any legislation along the lines of either the Norbeck bill or the Lenroot bill until the next session of Congress. We will have three months after the convening of the next Congress, if there is no special session in the meantime, to determine what kind of a bill we want to pass to take the place of the War Finance Corporation act.

Mr. President, I am not sufficiently versed in parliamentary procedure to know whether it is in order or not, but I would like to submit a motion that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Banking and Currency with instructions to study it in conjunction with the Norbeck bill or any other bill which may properly provide for the agricultural needs of the country.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, does the Senator make that motion now?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; I make the motion now.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. I would like to make one more comment before I yield. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] has offered an amendment providing for cooperative banking. A number of Senators have given no thought and no consideration to the matter of cooperative banking. I myself am not committed to cooperative banking, yet I think that with proper restrictions and proper regulation there is merit to the suggestion. It may be proper to incorporate a provision for cooperative banking in any new measure which is proposed to finance agriculture.

In addition, there are other amendments which will be offered from the floor by Senators which are vital to the whole credit system for agriculture. The amendment to extend the time from 9 to 12 months is a very important matter; it has a great deal of bearing on the whole situation, and yet I submit that the Committee on Banking and Currency have not considered properly whether there should be a 9 or 12 months' period of time for agricultural paper. So that with all the amendments proposed which are so vital to agriculture, nothing could possibly be lost by sending the whole matter of agricultural credits back to the Committee on Banking and Currency, together with all the amendments and everything else connected with it, in order that we may learn as to the desires and needs of agriculture, so that we may be definitely prepared to take it up at the next session of the Congress.

I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator has just submitted, as I understand, a motion to recommit the bill. That motion is proper, as I understand parliamentary procedure, at this time. But I suggest to the Senator that many Senators have gone for the day in view of the unanimous-consent agreement which was entered into and which calls for a vote on Friday next. Many of them doubtless intend to speak upon the bill. The Norbeck bill has not been fully explained or at least explained to the satisfaction of all, and doubtless some will desire to discuss that further. Could not the Senator accomplish the same thing if he deferred pressing his motion until some time after 2 o'clock on Friday, at which time the various amendments suggested will be called up for consideration and for vote?

Mr. COUZENS. I have no objection to deferring action on the motion. I merely wish to give notice of it at this time.

Mr. KING. The Senator can renew his motion at that time.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator from Michigan gives notice that he will present the motion on Friday.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I understood the motion was more or less accompanied with instructions to the committee. It would not be voted on anyway until Friday under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the motion is not in order at this time, in my opinion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). The present occupant of the chair understands that under the unanimous-consent agreement the motion is not in order at this time.

Mr. LENROOT. If it is not in order now, it is not in order at any time.

Mr. COUZENS. Then I merely give notice that I am going to present the motion at the proper time.

Mr. LENROOT. A motion to recommit has preference over a motion to amend. If the motion is not in order now it will not be in order next Friday. That is the proposition I submit to the Chair, that the motion will not then be in order by reason of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he thinks the motion to recommit is cut off by the language of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. LENROOT. I will have to examine it before I express an opinion.

Mr. LODGE. My own impression is that it is not cut off by the wording of this unanimous consent.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; the unanimous-consent agreement does not cut it off.

Mr. COUZENS. I should hope not. It would be a peculiar state of affairs if, under a unanimous-consent agreement, we could not present a motion to recommit a bill to the committee.

Mr. LENROOT. The precedents are unbroken that a motion to recommit is not in order when there is a unanimous-consent agreement for the final disposition of the bill.

Mr. COUZENS. I would like to have a ruling from the Chair on the question.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understood the Senator from Michigan to withdraw his motion for the present.

Mr. COUZENS. I want to have the ruling of the Chair on the matter. Is a motion to recommit to the committee in order at any time before the unanimous-consent agreement becomes operative?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. As I understand, the Senator from Michigan wants a ruling from the Chair now as to whether or not he can make the motion now or, in case he so desires can he make it after 2 o'clock on Friday.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. COUZENS. I am trying to ascertain what is the ruling of the Chair, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has ruled that the motion is not in order.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. The motion of the Senator from Michigan, if made at that time, would be in order, would it not, after the third reading of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that a recommitment would not be a final disposition of the bill, and the Senate has agreed to the final disposition of the bill on Friday.

Mr. COUZENS. At no time between now and then would a motion to recommit the bill to the committee be in order? Is that the ruling of the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the ruling.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if the Senator from Michigan desires now to make the motion to recommit the bill, in order that we may now dispose of the question, I shall be very glad to ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

Mr. COUZENS. It will be entirely agreeable to me to vote now or at any time on the question of whether the Senate wishes to recommit the bill for proper study.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

Mr. LENROOT. I am willing to have that done now, but I should not wish to say what I should be willing to do later.

Mr. COUZENS. I will agree that that may be done now.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest that the unanimous-consent agreement having been made, if it is out of order—and that, I understand, is the ruling of the Chair—to make a motion to recommit after the third reading of the bill, then, for the same reason, it is out of order now. If a unanimous-consent agreement may be made now that will make the motion in order at this time, then a unanimous-consent agreement could be entered into which would make it in order after the third reading of the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. LODGE. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to suggest both to the Senate and the Senator from Michigan that the rule providing that a motion to recommit shall not be in order until the third reading of a bill has a real reason behind it. At that time all the amendments to a bill have been disposed of and Senators in voting whether they desire that the bill shall be recommitted or not will be guided to a great extent very likely by the condition in which the bill may then be. When the third reading of the pending bill comes it may be an entirely different bill from what it is now. That is the reason for the parliamentary rule. It may be that Senators who would vote against the bill would then vote for it, or it may be the other way; in other words, under the parliamentary situation if we are now called upon to vote on the motion to recommit the bill, we will vote on the motion to recommit before we know what the condition of the bill is going to be before it comes to a final vote.

Mr. LENROOT. To what parliamentary rule does the Senator from Nebraska refer to the effect that a motion to recommit is only in order after the third reading of a bill?

Mr. NORRIS. I think there is such a rule. At any rate, I think there are such precedents in the previous practice of the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. No; it is expressly provided in the rule that the motion to recommit has a privilege over the motion to amend, and that it is in order at any time unless some agreement to the contrary shall have been made.

Mr. NORRIS. When the bill comes to a third reading is the time we ought to vote on the motion to recommit. I have never known an instance where the vote was not taken in that way. When all the amendments to the bill shall have been acted on a Senator then knows whether he favors the bill or whether he desires that it shall be recommitted; whether he desires to pass it as it then is or not.

Mr. COUZENS. Has the Senator from Wisconsin any objection to unanimous consent that we take a vote on the motion to recommit after the third reading of the bill?

Mr. LENROOT. I will decide that question when it is presented. I have no objection to the vote being taken now or to the Senator bringing up the question later. Of course, the Senator may then make his request, but I will not indicate now what I shall do.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as I understand—I have not the printed unanimous-consent agreement before me—all that stands in the way of the motion to recommit is the fact that the unanimous-consent agreement provides for a final disposition of the bill and the adoption of such a motion would not be final disposition. That difficulty, however, may be met by a unanimous-consent agreement. Although I do not think there is any rule about making the motion to recommit after the third reading of a bill, certainly that motion is the motion which is always made last, for the reason which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has stated. I think that has certainly been the custom and the practice of the Senate. As I have no objection to giving unanimous consent to take a vote on the motion at any time, and, as it is presented now, I do not know why we should not vote on it now.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, is it not a fact that a motion to recommit a bill, if agreed to, is the final disposition of the bill?

Mr. LODGE. No; it has been held that it is not.

Mr. FLETCHER. It strikes me when we come to the question of the final disposition of a bill that the motion to recommit would be in order, and action on that motion, if it be agreed to, would mean the final disposition of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. That question has been argued here many times. Though I can not undertake to cite all the decisions, I know that former Vice President Marshall decided that the adoption of a motion to recommit a bill was not a final disposition of a bill. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the bill has got to come to a final disposition, and it has been held that a recommitment is not a final disposition.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it has been so held, although I am inclined to think it has been held both ways. I should like to read to the Senate a portion of the rule of the Senate. I refer to clause 2 of Rule XV. While the rule does not say, in so many words, that the motion to recommit shall be made after amendments are disposed of, it clearly leads in that direction, and, as everybody concedes, that is the most logical way to proceed. The rule reads:

2. When a bill or resolution shall have been ordered to be read a third time, it shall not be in order to propose amendments, unless by unanimous consent, but it shall be in order at any time before the passage of any bill or resolution to move its commitment.

Mr. LODGE. That is the time when the motion to recommit a bill is usually made.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and that is the logical time to make the motion.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska will look at Rule XXII he will see that a motion to commit is expressly named as being in order and privileged only ahead of a motion to amend.

Mr. LODGE. Under the terms of the unanimous-consent agreement and under the rulings, as I recall them, it seems to me that the only way to meet this situation and to allow the Senator from Michigan to have a vote on this motion is by unanimous consent, which I think ought to be given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to taking a vote on the motion of the Senator from Michigan at this time?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I think there is not a quorum now present, and I doubt if we could secure the presence of a quorum at this time, because only 50 Senators answered to their names when the roll was last called. Of course, unless a quorum can be secured, we will not be able to have a vote at this time, and, I repeat, I doubt if the presence of a quorum can be secured.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would be determined by a call of the Senate.

Mr. COUZENS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if the Senator desires to take a vote now, I ask unanimous consent that that motion shall be in order at this time, notwithstanding the unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, pending that request I do not think it is necessary to have unanimous consent. When the Senate agrees that it will vote at a certain time on a bill and all amendments thereto, that means if the bill is before the Senate at that time. If we are going to cut off all other motions that might be made except by unanimous consent we will have to state that in unanimous-consent requests hereafter.

Here is a Senator who has reached the point in the consideration of this bill where he wants to have it recommitted, in order that certain things may be put on it in the committee, and then it may be brought back. Does the Chair hold that he shall not have the right to move that it shall go back to the committee for certain purposes because that unanimous-consent arrangement has been reached in the Senate?

I do not think it is necessary to have unanimous consent to put the Senator's motion to the Senate. It seems to me that a motion to recommit a bill should be in order at any time, so that the Senate could have the opportunity to say whether or not it desired to recommit it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I dislike to differ from the Senator from Alabama; I know his parliamentary skill; but the rulings that have been made, the last one by Vice President Marshall, are to the effect that a motion to recommit can not be made when the agreement is that the bill shall go to a final disposition; and he ruled out even a motion to lay on the table, on the ground that it was not a final disposition. He said:

The Chair may be mistaken about it; that would be quite natural; but the present recollection of the Chair is that he ruled that it could not be recommitted to the committee; that that was not a final disposition at all, but the measure would simply go back to the committee and again be reported to the Senate, and that such a course was a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement. That is the Chair's recollection of the ruling he made, although he may be mistaken, and it might be well to take a moment to look it up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair finds, through the courtesy of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], that substantially the same question was ruled upon by the Chair on the 17th of October, 1914, where, under a unanimous-consent agreement, I ruled that a motion to lay the bill on the table was not in order, not being a final determination; that although it usually and ordinarily constituted a disposition of the measure, still it might be again taken from the table. The Chair sustains the point of order of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Harding] and rules that the joint resolution can not be recommitted to the committee.

That is the last ruling, and I think there are previous rulings to the same effect.

Mr. WATSON. It could be done by unanimous consent, however.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; that is what we are trying to get, but the Senator from Alabama contends that those rulings are wrong.

Mr. HEFLIN. My contention is that a unanimous-consent agreement is reached for the purpose of stopping debate upon a bill at a certain time.

Mr. LODGE. That is not the language of it. The language is, "to final disposition."

Mr. HEFLIN. Well, it is to vote upon the bill and all amendments thereto if it is then before the Senate; but suppose some Senator desires to have it recommitted and the Senate wants to recommit it, will we not be permitted to vote upon that question until we have debated it for two days longer, when, perhaps, we do not want to debate it for two days longer?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to putting the motion to recommit made by the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HEFLIN. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. Now I ask for the yeas and nays upon the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COUZENS. Will the Chair state the question before the roll is called?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to recommit. On that question the yeas and nays have been demanded and ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.
Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr.

JONES]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] to the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ERNST (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] and will permit my vote to stand.

Mr. HARRIS. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HALE (after having voted in the negative). I am informed that my pair, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], would vote as I have voted; and I will therefore allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CARAWAY (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. McKINLEY] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], on account of illness.

Mr. McCUMBER (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. GLASS (after having voted in the negative). I should like to explain that I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], but I have his permission to vote if I please, and therefore I will let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON];

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD]; and

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

The result was announced—yeas 4, nays 51, as follows:

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to call up the conference report on House bill 13696, which I submitted earlier in the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be read.

The reading clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13696) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 15, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 26, 27, and 28.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 4, 9, 12, 13, 14, and 34, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following: "$2,139,360, and no part of this sum shall be available for the care, maintenance, protection, fuel, light, etc., for the Interstate Commerce Commission Building"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have not agreed upon amendments numbered 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 16, 25, 29, 30, 31, 32, and 33.

F. E. WARREN,
REED SMOOT,
WM. J. HARRIS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

WILL R. WOOD,
EDWARD H. WASON,
L. J. DICKINSON,
JOSEPH W. BYRNS,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the Senator if the conferees have agreed?

Mr. WARREN. The conferees agreed as to certain items, and there are certain items which have to go back to the House. That is why I wish to have the report considered now, so that we can adopt the part of it upon which the conferees have agreed. As I said, the other items still in disagreement will go back to the House for action.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

STANDARD FOR BUTTER.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of Senate bill 3858, to define butter and to provide a standard therefor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. CURTIS. With the understanding that there will be no debate, I shall not object.

Mr. STERLING. I do not think there will be any debate. It is a short bill, of nine lines, defining a standard for butter. It is a measure of great importance to the dairymen and creamery men throughout the country. They are asking for its passage.

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the nature of the bill? I did not hear the Senator's request.

Mr. STERLING. It is to define a standard of butter, the amount of butter fat or milk fat that shall be in butter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The reading clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purposes of the food and drug act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stats. L., p. 768), "butter" shall be understood to mean the food product usually known as butter, and which is made exclusively from milk or cream, or both, with or without common salt, and with or without additional coloring matter, and containing not less than 80 per cent by weight of milk fat.

Mr. STERLING. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator a question before I give consent to the consideration of the bill. Does the bill mean that in every manufactory of butter in the United States there must be a man representing the Government to see that the butter tests 80 per cent?

Mr. STERLING. No; I do not think it means that at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the purpose of it?

Mr. STERLING. The purpose is to fix 80 per cent as the standard as against a standard that was fixed by a joint committee which fixed 82 per cent as the amount of butter fat or milk fat that should be contained in butter. That is impracticable and unworkable, as found by the Department of Agriculture itself. Nearly all the States fix 80 per cent as the amount of butter fat necessary. This is to interpret the pure food law, as it were, and fix 80 per cent as the standard.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the department recommend it?

Mr. STERLING. The Committee on Agriculture recommends it, and I understand that the department itself is in favor of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think if the bill provides for the overturning of a standard that has already been set up, it is important enough to be passed over for the day.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will just withhold the objection until I read a word or two from the report of the committee, I think he will be satisfied.

Mr. McKELLAR. I withhold the objection.

Mr. STERLING. The report states that—

These standards or requirements originate in the joint committee on definitions and standards, which committee is composed of three members of the Department of Agriculture, three members of the Association of Official Agricultural Chemists, and three members of the Association of the American Dairy, Food, and Drug Officials. Any standard proposed by this joint committee must first receive the approval of both of the associations represented on the committee before it is submitted to the Department of Agriculture. If approved by the Secretary it is then promulgated by him as a standard which the department proposes to enforce.

These standards or definitions do not have the force and effect of law, but merely serve as a guide. Failure to comply with the standard results in action being brought by the department in the proper court for violation of the food and drugs act. This requires the collection of that proof which is necessary, and which would be required to be collected whether or not a standard had been promulgated, as, for instance, proof to show the custom of the trade, the general practice of the industry, and the like.

In the enforcement of the State food and drugs acts, the State commissioner or enforcement agency in many States is authorized by law to adopt the standards of the United States Department of Agriculture.

This provision requiring 82 per cent of milk or butter fat, as I have said, has been found unworkable. I read further from the report:

This was soon found to be an impractical standard and unenforceable, being out of line with the existing custom in the trade, which is almost universally on the basis of 80 per cent butter fat.

That has been demonstrated in several States; and they are protesting against the requirement of 82 per cent butter fat, which the Secretary of Agriculture admits is impracticable.

Mr. McKELLAR. But the Secretary does not recommend the passage of the bill, nor does the Department of Agriculture recommend it?

Mr. STERLING. I think, by inference anyhow, it is very plain that they are in favor of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think if a commission has passed upon it and fixed 82 per cent as the test, and it is sought without referring to that committee and without the direction of the Department of Agriculture to change it, it is important enough to be looked into. My State is one of the greatest butter States in the Union, and I do not know how this bill would affect Tennessee's butter interests. If it would affect our butter interests favorably, I should support the measure; but if not, I should oppose it. Not knowing how it would affect those interests, I shall be compelled to object to the consideration of the bill this afternoon.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator desires to object, let him object. It is a very simple bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously made, took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, February 1, 1923, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 31, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, our faith has been justified; Thy mercy has come to pass. Whether as a cherished anticipation or as a glad, sweet surprise, it is upon us, and we thank Thee. Some things stay only a little while, but Thou wilt never leave nor forsake us. O teach us again: Blessed are they who carry forward life's broken ministries; blessed are they who renew the light of a day that is dark; blessed are they who hold on to their better selves; blessed are they who take their places in the counsels of a great Nation to serve and to bless a land that is the providence of an infinitely wise and holy God. We pray in the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday and the call rests with the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

RADIO COMMUNICATION.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 13773, to amend an act to regulate radio communication, approved August 13, 1912, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls up the bill H. R. 13773. This bill is on the Union Calendar. The House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] will resume the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13773, to regulate radio communication, with Mr. STAFFORD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on Wednesday last the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] was asking recognition to offer an amendment. Before the Chair recognizes the gentleman, with his indulgence, the Chair wishes to correct a ruling which he made offhand in respect to the timeliness of points of order to provisions of bills carrying appropriations.

The Chair ruled just before the committee rose that under the language of clause 5 of Rule XXI the point of order could be made at any time. On subsequent consideration the Chair wishes to change that ruling. All rules are for the purpose of orderly procedure. If a Member of the House should be granted the privilege at any time to rise to a point of order on a provision of a bill with more than one section before it is read it would cause considerable disarrangement in the orderly consideration of bills. No rights are lost by a Member being denied the privilege to raise that point of order until the paragraph to which he wishes to make the point of order is read.

An illustration of the rather loose procedure attendant upon the strict interpretation of this rule, that it may be raised at any time, was shown in the consideration of this bill on Wednesday last. A point of order was raised to a section that was quite distant from where the Clerk was reading. The Chair, on the spur of the moment, gave a literal construction to the rule, which says that it may be raised at any time. At the request of the Chair it was temporarily withdrawn so as to give opportunity to the Chair to consider the parliamentary question, only to have it presented again, rather abruptly, a few minutes later.

The present occupant of the Chair will hold that the phrase "may be raised at any time" means that no Member loses his rights by withholding the making of the point of order when the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider the bill, or even when introduced. It is placed there so as to protect the Member, in order that he may raise it at the proper time, and the Chair will hold that when the committee is considering a bill by paragraphs or sections, and the bill contains a paragraph which some Member claims is violative of clause 5 of Rule XXI, to which the Chair refers, it will not be in order to raise that point of order until the section is read.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. This is an important matter, because the decision of the Chair will set aside a rule of the House, if it be followed. The point of order under clause 5 of Rule XXI is not made to any particular section of a bill. It is made to the entire bill or resolution, because of some section, and that is the reason for the rule which provides that it may be raised at any time, because it is raised against the whole measure. The whole measure is at fault whenever any section of it attempts to appropriate money in violation of Rule XXI.

The CHAIRMAN. In reply to the objection raised by the gentleman from Texas, the Chair would state that the point of order to any paragraph or section of a bill because it contains an appropriation which the committee has no authority to report does not vitiate the entire bill. It merely destroys that part of the bill, so far as the appropriating feature is concerned. Mr. Speaker GILLET, in a ruling made at the instance of our late parliamentary leader, Mr. James R. Mann, who raised the question so as to have a ruling, decided as to the opportuneness of pressing a point of order that it was akin to points of order raised on appropriation bills, that the appropriating committee has no authority to carry legislation on an appropriation bill, and that in the consideration of appropriation bills a Member is not privileged to rise to make a point of order at any time to some subsequent provision merely because the bill carries a paragraph embodying legislation which violates the rule. The Chair follows the logic of that ruling and of the practice of the House in connection with points of order on appropriation bills which carry legislation, and so far as the present occupant of the chair is concerned he wishes to modify the ruling he made last week when this bill was under consideration, that the point of order could be raised at any time at the pleasure of the Member who wishes to raise it. Such a practice would cause confusion in the orderly procedure of the House and of the committee.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me there is a great distinction in the ruling referred to by the Chairman or the Speaker and the question in this case. This is one complete amendment. The rule is, if any part of an amendment is subject to a point of order then all the amendment is subject to the point of order; that is, it is all out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say, to bring this to a close, that the Chair has ruled; this is not one amendment. There are 11 sections—

Mr. DOWELL. Eleven sections, but it is offered as one amendment to a certain section and so considered by the House when it comes to amend this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to inform the gentleman from Iowa that he is in error when he says it is one amendment offered to one section. It is several amendments offered to three sections of the existing law. There was some discussion as to that and a decision by the Chair at the last session of the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have regular order. The Chair has decided.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas to offer an amendment.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, line 7, after the word "hereby," strike out the word "authorized" and insert in lieu thereof the word "directed."

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the only place in this bill where any effort is made to curb the tendency to monopoly in this business is in this immediate paragraph, and in this paragraph the Secretary of Commerce is not directed to refuse or revoke a license when he finds companies are trying to monopolize, but he is simply authorized to do so. It seems to me that if the Secretary of Commerce finds that, in his judgment, a company is trying to secure a monopoly in this business he should be directed to say that they proceed no further. And this is not a mere idle chance that there may be a monopoly. It is readily recognized that there is a grave danger of monopoly in the business, and my information is that the American Telegraph & Telephone Co., the Western Electric Co., the Westinghouse Electric Co., and the American Radio Corporation are today endeavoring to get a monopoly in this business. The Western Electric Co. monopolizes all broadcasting telephone apparatus that are recognized by the telephone company. In other words, it manufactures the apparatus that is used in the broadcasting stations in that connection. The American Telegraph & Telephone Co. owns 100 per cent stock in the Western Electric Co. These big four companies have gone into a combination by means of which they seem to have divided the business up. The Western Electric Co. is to manufacture all broadcasting apparatus that is used in connection with telephone transmission. The other companies agree not to manufacture that. The Radio Corporation sells receiving sets, but they have agreed to sell only receiving sets that are manufactured by the Westinghouse Electric Co. and by the General Electric Co., so they are all in cahoots. Only a short time ago the American Telegraph & Telephone Co. owned a million dollars' worth of stock in the Radio Corporation, and so much public pressure was brought to bear on them they transferred their stock, but retained a contract of such a nature that it enabled them to bar the Radio Corporation from entering the field of commercial communication within the United States.

The most important thing in connection with the proposed legislation is to try to curb monopoly in this business. We have considerable regulatory powers under the present law if they are used, but there is a grave danger of a monopoly. It is mentioned in the Popular Radio Magazine that the American Telegraph & Telephone Co. refused to furnish its wires and service for the purpose of broadcasting an entertainment from the Century Theater in New York, which has been giving radio concerts. There was talk about it all over the country, but they did not purchase the apparatus from these big four, and the American Telegraph & Telephone Co. said: "We will not let you transmit your entertainment over our wires." That is the situation with which we are confronted to-day, and with that situation prevailing does not this House think when the Secretary of Commerce, in view of the immense powers granted under this bill, finds that the companies are undertaking to monopolize the situation he should be directed to refuse or revoke—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, to my mind there would be very little difference in the effect of the language even if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas were adopted. But I wish to call attention to the fact that the action of the Secretary of Commerce in refusing a station license under the conditions mentioned in this paragraph is dependent upon the judgment of the Secretary of Commerce as to whether the person, company, or corporation which is the subject of the action by the Secretary is monopolizing or seeking to monopolize radio communication, directly or indirectly, through the control of the manufacture or the sale of radio apparatus or by any other means. In other words, the action of the Secretary rests within the discretion and judgment of the Secretary. Your committee does not believe under such circumstances that it is wise, from a practical standpoint or from a legislative standpoint, to incorporate a mandatory provision upon an executive officer to perform a specific act.

There can be no doubt as to what the action of the Secretary of Commerce would be when a situation arises which in his judgment is of a character to produce monopoly or monopolization. There is no doubt but that some of the things to which the gentleman from Texas has referred are threatening in the manner he has indicated. There is a tendency toward monopolization of an art of this sort, which is based so largely upon constantly occurring inventions and improvements.

However, the committee believes that, within the purposes of this legislation, within the purposes of this bill, the use of the word "authorized" is better, will probably lead to less complication and less confusion than the use of the word "directed"; and, speaking for myself, I want to say I am opposed to the proposition suggested by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to say I do not see any particular potency in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], and I hope it will be rejected, because in my opinion the word "authorized" is for these purposes tantamount to the word "directed."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the amendment and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that all debate on the pending section and all amendments thereto be now closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WINGO. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas calls for a division.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. How was my motion put?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I object to the interruption of the proceedings in that way.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] did not extend to the pending section and all amendments thereto, but to the pending amendment and amendments thereto. The Chair put it erroneously. The motion is to close debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] calls for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 36, noes 12.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, if we are not to have a discussion, I think we ought to have a quorum.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, and on that I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the committee do now rise, and on that he requests tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. CHINDBLOM and Mr. WINGO to act as tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion to rise.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 21, noes 47.

The CHAIRMAN. On this vote the ayes are 21, and the noes are 47, and the committee decides not to rise. Did the gentleman from Arkansas make the point of no quorum?

Mr. WINGO. I thought I did. I repeated it three or four times.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. WINGO. I suggest that the point of no quorum was made, and on that the motion to rise was made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the lack of a quorum is not necessarily determined by the taking of the vote by tellers.

Some Members have not passed between the tellers. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty Members are present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll to develop a quorum.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STAFFORD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13773) to amend an act to regulate radio communication, approved August 13, 1912, and for other purposes, found itself without a quorum, whereupon he caused the roll to be called, when 279 Members, a quorum, answered to their names; and he handed in the names of the absentees to be entered on the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the committee resumed its session, with Mr. STAFFORD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The question being taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 8, line 25, after the word "interest," insert the following: "Or whenever the Secretary of Commerce shall find that in his judgment any person or corporation is monopolizing or seeking to monopolize radio communication directly or indirectly through the control of the manufacture or sale of radio apparatus or by other means."

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I think the committee should accept this amendment, and in that connection I want to call your attention to the fact that on page 6, where the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to refuse a station license to any person or corporation seeking to obtain a monopoly, that limitation simply applies to refusing a license. Now, over here is this other paragraph, to which I have offered an amendment, is the place where authority is granted to revoke a license.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; I will be glad to yield to the gentleman when I have finished this brief statement. I have followed the language of the committee on the question of refusing a license. I have also made it apply to the authority of the Secretary to cancel a license, if one has already been issued.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That was the information I was seeking.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is exactly what I tried to do. At the only place in the bill where the question of monopoly is treated you have authorized the Secretary of Commerce to refuse a station license to a company or corporation which is seeking to obtain a monopoly. Over here in a subsequent paragraph you authorize the Secretary of Commerce under certain conditions to cancel a license already issued. I am seeking to give the Secretary the same right to cancel a license already issued to a company or corporation in the event of monopoly. I think the committee should accept that amendment, because a company after it has gotten its license is more likely to obtain a monopoly than it is to obtain a monopoly before it secures the license. The committee recognizes in its report the danger of monopoly in connection with this matter.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Unless somebody desires to discuss the amendment further, I think I am authorized to say that the committee are agreeable to accepting it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Then I have nothing further to say on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. At what point in the bill did the Clerk stop reading when we last had it under consideration?

Mr. STAFFORD. The Clerk is reading at line 15, page 9.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROACH: On page 4, after the word "act," in line 20—

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. ROACH. Let the amendment be reported, and then the gentleman can make his point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The reading has proceeded far enough to show on its face that it is subject to a point of order. Perhaps the gentleman can make it in order at some other place.

Mr. ROACH. I suggest that the amendment be reported and then the gentleman can make his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the amendment being reported reserving all points of order?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROACH: On page 4, after the word "act," in line 20, add the following: "Any person, company, or corporation affected by any decision, order, rule, or regulation made or issued by the Secretary of Commerce under the provisions of this act may have such decision, rule, order, or regulation reviewed by the advisory board created by this act by filing with the Secretary of Commerce a written request for such review with an assignment of the reasons therefor. Said advisory board is hereby given power to make such review, and by a majority vote of said board to confirm, modify, or reverse the action of the Secretary of Commerce with respect to any such decision, order, rule, or regulation, and it shall thereupon immediately certify the results of such review to the Secretary of Commerce, which shall stand as the decision in any such case."

Mr. BANKHEAD. A point of order.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I make the point of order that we have passed the section to which this amendment is offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. ROACH. I should like to be heard briefly on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will reserve his decision for a few minutes.

Mr. ROACH. I appreciate that we could not return to a section already passed in the bill except by unanimous consent. I think, however, the amendment I have offered is particularly pertinent at the point where I have offered it, and I believe it is in order, for the reason that this bill if properly construed consists of only one section, and that is section 1; or, to say the least of the matter, section 1 of the bill does not properly end until you reach the end of line 16, at page 11 of the bill. In other words, I present this amendment believing that it is in order for the reason that section 1 does not end until at the end of line 16, page 11, notwithstanding the fact that the committee reporting the bill have numbered it as they have. In other words, it is improperly numbered. A section of a bill must be complete in itself and contain, as it were, an independent subject matter. It is clear from the reading of this bill that it is improperly numbered by sections. The rule, as I understand it, provides that appropriation bills shall be read by paragraphs and that all other bills shall be read by sections. That means, to my mind, that if the Chair should judicially determine that this bill has only one section, then this amendment is in order, and the point of order should be overruled, and it is my contention that this puts the matter up to the Chair, and that the Chair should judicially determine whether this bill is improperly numbered by the committee reporting it and whether the entire bill is one section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to state for the benefit of the gentleman from Missouri and the committee that when this bill was last under consideration the question was raised whether the bill was one section or whether it was 11 sections. Technically it is one section. There is no rule, as the Chair has stated, providing that appropriation bills and revenue bills should be considered by paragraphs. It is a mere practice of the House, based upon the fundamental idea that what is best for orderly procedure should be followed, and recently that ruling has been extended to include omnibus lighthouse bills at the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Mann. The Chair held at the last session that it would be best for the orderly consideration of this bill that the usual practice be followed by considering it by sections, and so ruled. The Chair does not care in this particular instance to reverse his ruling of last week, and sustains the point of order.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is no desire upon the part of anyone to delay consideration of the bill. Here is a point that is worrying a good many of us who have tried to study this bill, yet handicapped by lack of technical information. Frankly, I have relied for all the information I have on a gentleman who, I think, is qualified to judge the merits of the bill and of the dangers which threaten radio communication at the present time. I am afraid the paragraph on page 6, lines 7 to 16, is not sufficient, and I am afraid the provisions of it will not reach the thing that now threatens a real monopoly of communication. I think it is unfortunate that the committee took the position it would oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Texas. In other words, I do not believe you ought to give to the Secretary any discretion to grant a license to men whom the Secretary himself might come to the conclusion were trying to monopolize communication. That would authorize him to do a thing which, according to his own judgment, would be unconscionable and wrong. Now, here is where the trouble comes in reference to the question of trying to reach it merely by either withholding or revoking a license. We will take for illustration those who are now seeking—and they are working indirectly in conjunction with those who have apparatus for sale—take, for illustration, those who have the control of copyright music as one illustration. My information is that there is now a working agreement—a gentleman's agreement, or whatever you call it—under which there is going to be this kind of demand made upon broadcasting stations throughout the country, and that is that before the station, say, in my city of Fort Smith would be permitted to take some local musician, some lady there who in her home now without any question is singing for friends a piece of copyright music—no question has ever been raised before that she should be permitted to play the score upon the piano and with her melodious voice entertain her friends with singing the words of something which was copyrighted, but the suggestion is now being made that if she were to go down to a radio broadcasting station and seek to do that, that before that broadcasting station would do that, or permit her to do that, they would have to pay to the holders of that copyright an exorbitant fee. Now, gentlemen—

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does not the gentleman think that would be a question altogether within the purview of the law relating to copyrights, and that if any rights have been acquired under the copyrights we could not now legislate so as to affect these rights?

Mr. WINGO. Well, now, if the gentleman would eliminate the last expression, I think I would agree. That is the answer I made to a friend of mine who presented that theory to me. I said, of course, if that question comes up as to the rights of a person under the copyright law that law had been judicially determined; but here is the point: Even though they may not have any rights under the copyright law to make such an exaction, yet by some kind of working arrangement with those who sell the instruments or apparatus you get yourself in an attitude where they get a complete monopoly along the line suggested, and you could not get any protection by appealing to the courts and saying that under the copyright law you are not permitted to do this; but if you went into court I think the gentleman will agree—this is my information—that no court has determined whether or not communication of a radio character comes within the provisions of these statutes affecting monopolies in restraint of trade. It is an unsettled question. The gentleman will appreciate the difficulty. I am not here just to criticize the committee, but I want to urge upon the committee before they pass this bill to see if they can not prevent this threatened evil other than by the two provisions that are conceded are the only two in the bill—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. I will ask for five additional minutes; I may not need that much time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINGO. So that we will not be in the attitude of waiting until a monopoly is built up here before we then undertake to regulate and cut out its evils. Now, I have great confidence in the gentleman from Maine, who is in charge of this bill. I have talked about this matter and showed some telegrams I have received. The only object I had in discussing this matter was to urge upon the committee the recognition of the fact that there is now a practical movement backed by big capital, which will mean, in the judgment of one man, a toll of about $20,000,000 a year, which will be levied in such a way that it will make it absolutely impossible to maintain a broadcasting station with unlimited facilities in other than 15 or 20 of the great cities of this Nation; and you do not want to do that. I hope the gentleman can find some provision in this bill that will check that present movement in its incipency, and not wait until it becomes an accomplished fact and then compel us to muddle along for several years trying to regulate a monopoly which we should prevent now at its inception.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROACH: Page 9, after the word "revocation," in line 15, add the following: "Any person, company, or corporation affected by any decision, order, rule, or regulation, made or issued by the Secretary of Commerce under the provisions of this act, may have such decision, rule, order, or regulation reviewed by the advisory board created by this act by filing with the Secretary of Commerce a written request for such review, with an assignment of the reasons therefor. Said advisory board is hereby given power to make such review and by a majority vote of said board to confirm, modify, or revert the action of the Secretary of Commerce with respect to any such decision, order, rule, or regulation, and it shall thereupon immediately certify the results of such review to the Secretary of Commerce, which shall stand as the decision in any such case."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane at this place in the consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, section 5, on page 13, provides for the organization of an advisory committee. Until that section has been passed upon there is no advisory committee, and we certainly would have an anomalous situation if we should now agree upon an amendment which would give powers to an advisory committee, and when we reach section 5 that section should go out of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, I concede the gentleman's point of order to be well taken for the present, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROACH. I shall offer the amendment when we reach section 5.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri to the fact that the advisory committee takes no action in this matter. It merely makes suggestions. He would have to reach the action of the Secretary of Commerce himself.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, by this amendment the advisory committee is given authority to take action on review from decisions of the Secretary or any rule or regulation he may make under the provisions of this bill. That is the purpose of it. When this bill was last under consideration the committee voted down the amendment to give the courts jurisdiction. Here is an arbitrary power placed in the hands of one man to control this great radio enterprise.

Mr. BLANTON. I am with the gentleman in having a proper court review, but I do not think he would reach it in the way he suggests.

Mr. ROACH. This gives the advisory committee the power of review.

Mr. BLANTON. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that I have understood it is the intention of the chairman to strike that entire paragraph out of the bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Oh, not the advisory committee; only that which relates to the payment.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, then I was mistaken in that.

Mr. ROACH. It will be my purpose to put it back in, if it should be stricken out.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 9, line 15, after the word "revocation," insert: "From any order of the Secretary of Commerce refusing, suspending, or revoking a license or permit, the person or corporation whose license or permit is refused or revoked or suspended shall have the right to appeal to a court of competent jurisdiction or review, which court shall have the power to affirm, modify, or revoke said order: Provided, The order of the Secretary of Commerce in refusing, suspending, or revoking such license or permit shall not be suspended pending final action by such court."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, and in making the point I concede that the present occupant of the chair has heretofore said that the change of a single word in an amendment renders the amendment in order. I do not think that ought to be the established practice. This same matter was practically disposed of a week ago.

Mr. ROACH. But it was to a different section of the bill that this amendment was offered when we considered the bill last week, and not to this section.

Mr. JONES of Texas. This amendment covers the whole field of revoking licenses. The other was limited.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the Chair adheres to the view previously expressed that the change of a single word renders it in order, I shall not press this point of order, but otherwise I would like to show that substantially the same amendment was acted upon a week ago when this bill was under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is crediting the present occupant of the chair with a decision that he has not been heretofore advised of. The present occupant of the chair does not recall ever having made such a ruling, but has taken occasion on the floor to argue the very position that the gentleman from Illinois has now stated.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Then, I beg the Chair's pardon. My recollection is at fault. I do remember that the Chair cited a decision from ex-Speaker Clark to the effect that the change of a single word rendered an amendment in order. My memory is very badly at fault if it was not this present occupant of the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman offering the amendment if this amendment was substantially offered to a prior section in the consideration of this bill?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will state that it was not. A portion of the amendment covered in this amendment was covered in the previous amendment, but there was no question in the other amendment about the suspension of a license or the granting of a license. It was a mere question of refusing or revoking a license. This also applies to another section granting further power of revocation on the part of the Secretary of Commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman acquaint the Chair with the difference in phraseology between this and the prior section?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Under the previous amendment there was no question raised about the suspension of licenses. I will call the attention of the Chair to the paragraph that we have under consideration on the next page, page 11 of the bill:

An operator's license shall be in such form as the Secretary of Commerce shall prescribe, and may be suspended by him for a period not exceeding two years.

That begins on page 10 of the bill. That is the paragraph under consideration. No reference was made in my previous amendment to the question of suspending licenses. That is one phase of the question.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. ROACH. I believe the gentleman is in error there. I have the gentleman's former amendment before me.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Missouri please cite the page of the RECORD?

Mr. ROACH. It is on page 2352. Here is the enactment as offered by the gentleman from Texas, as printed in the RECORD:

Provided, That from any action of the Secretary of Commerce in refusing or revoking a license, the person whose license is revoked or refused shall have the right to appeal to a court of competent jurisdiction—

And so forth.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It does not say anything about suspending a license.

Mr. ROACH. The amendment further provides—which court shall have the power to confirm, modify, or reverse the decision of the Secretary, but the decision of the Secretary of Commerce shall not be suspended pending the decision of such court.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The amendment which the gentleman has read bears out the very point I was making, that the amendment says nothing about suspending a license. On page 10 of the bill the Secretary of Commerce is given authority to suspend licenses for a period of two years. Now, that is one difference in the amendment. If the Chair wants to hear another, I will give him another.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless the gentleman from Texas can cite to the Chair some ruling which will hold that this amendment is in order, the Chair will rule—

Mr. JONES of Texas. If the Chair will let me call his further attention—I do not know whether the Chair was listening or not—I will say the other amendment did not refer to suspending licenses at all. I call the Chair's attention to the bottom of page 10, where it is provided—

An operator's license shall be in such form as the Secretary of Commerce shall prescribe, and may be suspended by him for a period not exceeding two years.

That suspension is an entirely different thing. That language is at the bottom of page 10 of the bill:

An operator's license shall be in such form as the Secretary of Commerce shall prescribe, and may be suspended by him for a period not exceeding two years—

And it gives the grounds for that suspension. Now, the suspension for two years is an entirely different thing from revoking or refusing a license. The previous amendment simply referred to the refusing or revoking of a license. This amendment covers not only the refusing and revoking but also the suspension. That is involved in this paragraph at the bottom of page 10.

The CHAIRMAN. What prevented the gentleman from including the word "suspension" when offering his amendment under the previous section?

Mr. JONES of Texas. We had not reached that point then. We had read down to section 4.

The CHAIRMAN. No; you have only read to section 3 on page 9.

Mr. JONES of Texas. However, that may be, the principle is the same. The amendment is different, and part of it is germane to the section.

I want to call the attention of the Chair to this other proposition: In the first paragraph, where the amendment was offered before, it was a general provision with reference to granting and revoking licenses. Under section (f), on page 8, there are a number of different grounds granted to the Secretary which were not included under the first section.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, let me talk a while.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear from the gentleman from Indiana who, the Chair understands, entertains a different idea from that of the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] offered an amendment on page 4 which contained very similar language to the present amendment, but was different in some slight respects. The committee voted it down. Now the amendment is offered on page 9 to another subsection, and a point of order is made that the amendment is not in order. The gentleman who has made the point of order has not indicated what rule of the House or of the committee such a proposition violates.

I just want the Chair to notice the position that such course would place the committee or the House in if the Chair should hold that the amendment is not in order because substantially that kind of an amendment was offered before. It would put the committee and the House in this situation: If we had read section 4 of a bill and some gentleman on the floor should offer an amendment to that section or that subdivision and the committee should determine that it ought to be voted down because it ought to go somewhere else in the bill—it might be appropriate in either place, but in the view of the Committee of the Whole it would be more appropriate under section 8—then if we are to establish, Mr. Chairman, the proposition that the Chair can hold an amendment out of order, offered to a subsequent section, because the committee has voted it down on a prior section, that lets the Chair arbitrarily decide that the committee has no right to choose where it shall place an amendment.

If such a proposition were to be held to be the rule of this House, it would take out of the Committee of the Whole and of the House the power that the committee has and that the House has to determine the order of legislation. Suppose an amendment is offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] to section 4, but the committee wants to strike out section 4 altogether. The committee votes down Mr. JONES's amendment and votes out section 4. Then suppose at section 6 the committee wants to embody the amendment in the bill. If the Chair should hold the amendment out of order, because it is substantially the same thing that was rejected by the committee before, offered at a former place in the bill, it would rob the committee of the right to put it in at any time.

In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Speaker Clark, in a very well-considered decision, held specifically that when an amendment is offered and somebody offers another amendment, which is a change of one word, the Chair can not determine, as a matter of law and as a matter of rule, that the same thing has been passed upon. It is for the committee to determine the value and meaning of the legislative words used by the committee.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, a moment ago I apologized to the Chair for having misquoted him as having made substantially the statement which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] just quoted from ex-Speaker Clark. I find that I was in error. On January 23 of this year a situation arose in which I made the same point of order, and the matter was then determined by another occupant of the chair.

Mr. BUTLER. Was it the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No; it was the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. McARTHUR].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. A distinction should be made in passing upon the question whether the same provision has been acted upon heretofore, as to whether the amendment has been voted up or voted down. If it has been voted into the bill and then it is offered again, with a slight modification by the addition of a word or two or a phrase or clause, that would not entitle it to be held in order for the reason that the subject matter was under consideration and opportunity had been given to offer and have adopted any germane amendment. But where an amendment is voted down, as in this case, and it is again proposed with a modification which makes it different from the form in which it was offered before, the Chair holds that it is within the province of the Member to offer the amendment in the changed form. Therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. McARTHUR. That is a righteous decision.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I am very much in earnest in offering this amendment. It protects all the activities of the Secretary of Commerce. It provides that if a man has his business condemned or his license revoked, and he thinks he has been wronged by that action on the part of the Secretary of Commerce, he may go into the courts to have the matter adjudicated. It further protects the activities of the Secretary of Commerce by providing that his orders shall remain in full force and effect until final action by the courts.

Gentlemen of the House, one of the proudest things in connection with the institutions of this country is the fact that we have always given even the humblest citizen the right to his day in court. I have always thought that one of the chief glories of the Constitution is the fact that you can not take the shirt from the back of the ragged street urchin without either securing the lad's consent or giving him compensation for the rags. But under the terms of this bill the say of Mr. Hoover is final, and even though a man may have his station nearly completed and may have devoted years of study to the mastery of his business, his property rights and his life business may be confiscated and destroyed without any right of review by or appeal to the courts. Gentlemen of the House, that is a monstrous proposition. It runs counter to all our traditions and all our history. An appeal was allowed in the packers bill, the grain futures bill, and in all of the other important measures by the terms of which tremendous power has been placed in the hands of one bureau or one man. Thus for the first time in all the glorious history of this country we are asked to surrender this great principle. I have great confidence in the judgment of this House, and I appeal to the sober second thought and fine intelligence of this body of representative men. I appeal to a principle that is older than this Government in behalf of one of the most highly prized rights of the Anglo-Saxon race, the right to a man's day in court. I appeal to you in behalf of the man far away in the interior of this country who has trusted you as his Representative to protect him in his liberty of action and his property rights. Will you deny him his privilege of asking that his right be passed upon by an impartial tribunal? This is a broad, big country, and I—

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the gentleman's amendment or some similar amendment, and if the gentleman will permit me I will make this observation, that it not only makes the decision of the Secretary of Commerce final in the matter, but it is final as to a subject that is in its infancy, undeveloped, scarcely understood by anyone at this time.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am glad the gentleman makes that suggestion. This is a subject that is in its infancy. A lot of people are interested in it, and of course in the confusion that arises some men are going to make mistakes. Sometimes they are going to violate regulations; and if a man has spent a lot of money in getting facilities ready, what harm can there be in giving that man his day in court before his property rights are destroyed? Why, gentlemen, that is one of the things that has made this country what it is. It is one of the distinctive things of the American Government and the American people, that they have always seen that if a man is wronged he has his right to go into court and have the question adjudicated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the committee will not adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES]. I was not here last Wednesday when we had this bill up for discussion, but I understand—in fact, I read in the RECORD—that this identical proposition was raised on another feature of the bill and at that time it was the judgment of the committee that it should not be agreed to. I think the committee was right in reaching that conclusion at that time after a full and fair consideration of the merits of this proposition. This is only an opportunity which the gentleman from Texas is seeking to bring this identical question before the committee again.

I want to say to the members of the Committee of the Whole that your subcommittee on radio, of which I had the honor to be a member, as well as the full committee, gave this entire subject of the amendment of the law of 1912 a very full and very free consideration. We considered this question in the committee, of the propriety of incorporating a right to appeal from the decision of the Secretary, and our judgment, based upon what we believed to be sound reason, was that it was an unwise provision to insert.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] made a pathetic appeal and referred to the boy and his ragged jacket and to the old Anglo-Saxon tradition of a man having his day in court. That principle is not violated here with reference to this matter of executive regulation. It is no new thing in the laws of the country to clothe executive officials, especially members of the Cabinet, with plenary power to fix rules and regulations governing some specific branch of the Government's business, and that is what is done here.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I can not at this time; I will in a moment if I get through. I fear if the gentleman's amendment be incorporated into the law which we are now seeking to write that the advantage and benefit of it would not be sought by those whom the gentleman from Texas is apparently seeking to protect, but, on the contrary, that it would give the powerful, the wanton, and the willful violators of the spirit and purpose of the law an advantage, although the Secretary after fair investigation had reached the conclusion that they were violators of the law, engaging in a monopoly, and should issue an order revoking their license after a fair opportunity to prepare their case. It would give them an advantage by which they could gain an indefinite time in which to continue in violation of the law itself until the slow and tedious processes of the courts should be fought out to final decision. Mr. Hoover is not a member of my party. I am in no wise responsible for his elevation to his present exalted station in public life, but from the man's character and achievements in the past, I do have a profound confidence, certainly in his integrity and honesty, as well as in his ability; and the very nature of the situation with which we were confronted made it necessary for us to confer upon one man some absolute and plenary power in order to regulate this situation and get it out of the dissatisfaction and confusion in which it is now, of which the whole country is complaining, amateurs as well as professional operators of these radio outfits. We believe that the Secretary will conscientiously, intelligently, wisely administer the powers with which he is clothed in this bill, and if he sees fit on fair consideration to revoke a license of a man who has willfully disobeyed the law or the regulations which have been suggested by a conference composed of those who are interested in all fields of this art, then the matter should rest; and there is nowhere else to correct it, unless you diversify the matter and scatter it somewhere, and then, certainly, we would have a continuation of this same confusion from which we are suffering. I do not think any substantial right would be denied any corporation or citizen under this provision. I believe they would be fairly and equitably administered by the present Secretary or any other Secretary who should be exalted to that distinguished position of trust and honor in our Government. I think it is very unwise to give these recalcitrant violators of the regulations and the law an opportunity to drag out their misfeasance in the tedious processes of the courts; and I hope, in line with many other regulations not subject to review in the exercise of executive discretion, that this power will be vested in the Secretary, and that this amendment will be rejected by the committee.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I find myself in complete harmony with the views expressed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I think the adoption of this amendment would be a grievous mistake, because its adoption will undo practically everything that the committee has sought to do and would make possible again the conditions which the committee think it absolutely necessary to cure in the public interest. This right to operate radio stations, transmit these messages, send this energy out in the air, is not an absolute right in the citizen of the United States, to be exercised by him without leave or control by any governmental body. At most it is a qualified right, to be exercised under the rules and conditions Congress lays down. We undertake here to lay down the rules, and we create in this legislation the body to determine the application of those rules to the facts in every case. We do create a court, and that court is the Secretary of Commerce, clothed with plenary powers to consider facts, to pass on the merits, and then to render a decision according to the public interests.

What is the situation that we are undertaking to correct? I can illustrate it by a specific case. There was a concern over in New York which obtained a license away back in May, 1920. It was found in the operation of that station that it interfered with communications between ships at sea, between ship and shore, and it was complained of by a number of people. It was complained of by the postal authorities, by the naval authorities, by numerous private users, and by the press of the country, located in New York. Ultimately the question came up to the Secretary as to whether he should revoke that license. For weeks and weeks and month after month that matter had been kept in the air. That station continued to operate in violation of the interests of the public, endangering every day it operated the lives of people at sea on the Atlantic coast. Finally the Secretary of Commerce issued an order revoking that license, and then the holder of that license came into court, petitioned for a mandamus directing the Secretary of Commerce to issue to him a license, and a court finally issued the order of mandamus to the Secretary of Commerce directing him to issue a license to that station, which had flagrantly violated the rights of the Nation and of the people of the country.

Mr. JONES of Texas. But that case is now on appeal, is it not?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes; it has not been finally decided; but that decision has been rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, and this condition has been going on for well-nigh two years. The committee recognizes that if there is to be any semblance of order brought out of this chaos there must be a decision of these questions, and a decision speedily, and we have created as a tribunal which is to determine these matters the Secretary of Commerce, who knows about it better than any other governmental agency.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does the gentleman know of any other bill of importance that has ever been passed by this body, except in time of war, where tremendous powers are placed in the hands of any one man, where the right of appeal to a court has not been given?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Oh, we never give a right of appeal from the exercise of discretion upon the part of an official of the Government.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Oh, the Federal Trade Commission and all these other matters that have regulative powers are all made subject to a provision of that kind.

Now, let me make another suggestion concerning this matter: I say to the members of this committee there has not been a single user of radio except one of the great interests, an interest that you men are complaining against, who has come before this committee and urged a review of the decisions of the Secretary by the courts. Every small user, every amateur, all the other users of radio are content to leave the decision in this matter to the Secretary of Commerce, and it is only this one great interest which came before us and urged that there may be an appeal to the court.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I want to begin where my colleague from Maine left off. I want to say to this committee that right this very day the gentleman representing the particular organization to which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE] referred is the man who has been going around to your offices talking to you on this subject and complaining about this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. There has been no man coming to my office.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No; but some of you gentlemen know where he has been. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is very easy to make a pathetic plea about a man getting a day in court. This bill, so far as the revocation of licenses is concerned, gives a man his day in court. Many people have a mistaken idea that a day in court means getting a right to appeal. The fact is that the common law required nothing but one trial. A writ of error or a prayer for an appeal never was a fundamental right. It is merely a right granted by statute. A hearing before a court of competent jurisdiction is all our institutions have ever considered absolutely necessary for the granting of that which we sometimes call a day in court.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. On this subject?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does not the gentleman recognize the fact that my amendment gives him the right to one trial in a court of competent jurisdiction and you are denying it?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Why, this section provides a hearing before the Secretary of Commerce before a license is revoked—

Mr. JONES of Texas. But not before a court.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It does not have to be before a court.

Mr. JONES of Texas. But the gentleman was talking about a court.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. In this case the Secretary of Commerce is the court. We do not have to call him a judge. We do not have to designate him by any particular name. He is empowered under the act to take testimony; he is directed to take testimony and ascertain the facts and act upon an ascertainment of the facts.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If the gentleman will permit, in levee and ditch proceedings frequently a board passes both upon the question of condemnation and the question of damages and no right of appeal has been given, and —

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I want to call attention also to the fact that in cases involving the proving up of land, proceedings are held before the Secretary of the Interior without appeal.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And actions under the navigation laws are not subject to review by the court. Why, Mr. Chairman, the position of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] is most anomalous. He started this morning by complaining that this bill did not give ample protection against monopolies. He now proposes a procedure which is going further than anything I can conceive of to assist those who would monopolize the use of the air. You give them the right to an appeal to the courts. You let them go into a nisi prius or trial court and then a court of appeals and then to the Supreme Court of the United States, running the gamut of all possible judicial proceedings, and you are taking the very best step possible to maintain them in their monopoly. That is the one thing this committee has wanted to avoid.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. An act of Congress provides that under certain conditions a pension may be granted to a soldier who served in the Army?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Suppose the pension is taken away from him, is there an appeal?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No.

Mr. BUTLER. Who has the right to do that, the commissioner?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. He has an appeal to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BUTLER. But not to a court?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Not to a court.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. That affects only that one particular soldier's rights. But the rights of all the individuals of the United States are affected if they have no redress in court—

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman mean to say that all the people of the United States are going into court seeking redress? Why, the converse is true. This amendment will not provide any redress for all the people of the United States or for the general public, but it will provide redress only for the individual owners and operators of radio communication.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to see the disposition shown on the part of the committee to rush this bill through just as it was framed without giving a proper day in court to aggrieved parties. It is my opinion that above every other question radio transmission is going to do more to solve the marketing problem of our farmers than anything else now promising hope to them.

Now, as I mentioned the other day, in the State where I live, Texas, we have an agricultural experiment station. There could arise this kind of a situation there: It could perfect a marketing system for farmers with radio transmission, advising them of markets where they could sell their products. That might be run in an intrastate manner so that it might not interfere in any way whatever with interstate control. Yet the Secretary of Commerce here in Washington, under the terms of this bill, could say that it constituted interference with the national control. He could, in passing upon the license question, after our agricultural experiment station had procured a license under this very provision, suspend that license for two years without giving our State authorities a hearing in court—an arbitrary transaction.

Let me say this, that eventually the Secretary of Agriculture, through a perfected Bureau of Markets, is going to furnish the farmers with a most valuable service, through radio transmission, telling them where markets may be found for the sale of their products. The Secretary of Agriculture now is using only four broadcasting stations in the United States. He is not operating them; they are not operated by him but for him. Yet this bill excepts only such stations as are owned and operated by the Government. It does not except stations that are operated for the Government. These four transmitting stations now are all operated on behalf of the Department of Agriculture, are operated, not by it, but for it. Yet their licenses could be suspended and the great work of furnishing information as to the markets of the country to the farmers throughout this land could be stopped arbitrarily.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Under this bill the Secretary of Commerce would have authority to establish priorities, and the recommendation of the conference is that the first right shall be to the Government station for the distribution of just such matter as the gentleman from Texas is now concerned in.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; but to-morrow he might change his mind. We do not want to put this power absolutely in the hands of any one man. It should be reviewable. Why should it not be reviewed in the courts?

My friend from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] talked about the day in court, meaning before the Secretary of Commerce. A day in court is presumed to be before a legal tribunal. Is the Secretary of Commerce a lawyer? Is he familiar with the legal rights of individuals as they should be administered in the courthouses of the land? No. So how could a man have a day in court? Not a day in a justice's court, where the justice of the peace is not a lawyer, but a day in court where there is a judge to administer the law of the land, to see that a man's legal rights are protected.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman conceive of any administrative function that under his theory should not be placed for review before a court?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, this is one of the biggest questions of the day. It is a question of transmitting intelligence from one community to another. It is the question of transmitting by radio, which is greater than the telegraph or the telephone. Would you bring in here a law that would place under the control of one man all the telegraph and telephone systems of the country without redress in court? No. This is a new question. The gentlemen of this committee want to get this bill through as they have written it. They do not want to accept an amendment from anybody, no matter how meritorious it may be.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman, I have been making a study of this matter as well as I could in the brief time of a week. I am going to support this bill without the present amendment if the committee votes down the amendment. But, seriously, I want to bring to the attention of the committee a few ideas with reference to this amendment. I can not see any very serious objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], because it leaves the order of the Secretary of Commerce in force and effect until final decision of the courts.

Now, I would like very much if the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] should stay in the bill. But, as I say, I have determined to support the bill whether it is in or not, because I feel that there should be regulation of radio.

And in that connection I desire the unanimous consent of the committee here to have inserted in my remarks a telegram and letters which I have received from gentlemen in my district who are interested in this bill and who desire me to favor the bill.

I say I shall favor the bill whether this amendment is put in or not, but I really think it would be more in accordance with the general idea of the fundamental form of our Government if we would give a man a right in court. While I have great respect for the Secretary of Commerce and I do not believe we can put this authority in better hands at the present time—

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ABERNETHY. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Has the gentleman received any appeals from users of radio, people interested in the manufacture or operation of radio, asking for this particular amendment?

Mr. ABERNETHY. I have not.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I thought not.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I say I am going to support the committee's bill as they have reported it, whether the amendment is adopted or not, but I am going to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, because I believe it is based on correct principles.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record by incorporating certain letters and telegram received by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the letters and telegram referred to:

NEWBERN, N. C., January 30, 1923.

HON. C. L. ABERNETHY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

I most earnestly urge you to vote for the White bill, H. R. 13773, when it comes up for action. It is a good bill and will go a long way in relieving present congestion and chaotic conditions in the radio game.

With sincere personal regards,

ALBERT W. PARKER.

RICHLANDS, N. C., January 28, 1923.

MR. CHAS. L. ABERNETHY,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ABERNETHY: I have your letter in regard to the proposed radio legislation: you failed to inclose the debate and report on the bill. But you state that you want my letter by Wednesday, so I am writing you. I am sorry I did not get this report.

But as the matter stands it is up to Congress to do something along this line. It is too big a question and too many people are affected to not do so.

It has been conservatively estimated that there are over a million and a half receiving radio sets in the country. Every set represents a home, and these homes have invited guests every night. So picture in your mind the number of people this legislation will reach.

Here is an instance I will relate to you: There are several hundred receiving sets in the city of Wilmington. When the revenue cutter Modock is there they are greatly interfered with—in fact, drowned out, so to speak—from the wireless of this boat transmitting, and it is claimed over one-half to two-thirds of this work could be sent by land wire and in this way give these people in Wilmington relief; but they do not do it. The Navy claims a nearly absolute monopoly on this business, holding the large transmitting stations to a low meter band.

We want this thing so regulated so the hundreds of thousands of listeners can receive the entertainment without this useless interference from the amateur sending stations and the naval stations.

Somebody might claim to raise the meter band would cause the now owners of receiving apparatus a hardship. Not at all. The only thing they would have to do would be to place a coil in the line, only five minutes' work, and at a cost of not exceeding $5.

Before this year is gone I expect to have the pleasure of listening to you in Washington over the radio. What do you say to that?

Here is the situation now: Here is a long seat; the Navy says "You boys can have only one little end, you can only sit so far, we have all the rest of the seat. If you have trouble in sitting comfortably, why just sit on each others lap; we don't care, it's not bothering us." Really that is about the way things are now. We want more seat, Charlie. Get me?

I am voicing the sentiments of at least 5,000,000 people.

With my kindest regards, I am, respectfully yours,

A. M. MCCUISTON.

JANUARY 30, 1923.

HON. CHARLES L. ABERNETHY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: I have read with much interest the letter of Dr. A. M. McCuiston to you relative to the pending radio bill.

I find myself very much in sympathy with the doctor's criticism of present conditions. In my opinion, some of the departments of the Government have been absolutely selfish in their own use of the radio. They have taken to themselves whatever wave lengths they saw fit and have operated in utter disregard of the rights of the listening public and of other transmitting stations. In the present situation there is no restraint upon them.

The pending bill does not go to the extent I personally would have it, but it does hold out some promise of bettered conditions. As you know from your study of the matter, paragraph D of section 1 provides that Government stations, except on board naval and other Government vessels while at sea, when transmitting any messages other than messages relating to Government business must conform to such rules and regulations designed to prevent interference as the Secretary of Commerce may prescribe. It is hoped and believed that this paragraph of the bill will do much to relieve from such unwarranted transmitting by vessels as Doctor McCuiston specifically complains of.

Under existing law, because of conditions which you well understand, practically all broadcasting is limited to the wave lengths between 300 and 600 meters. By existing law the wave lengths between 600 and 1,600 meters are reserved for naval and military purposes. The pending bill repeals this allocation to these Army and Navy stations of this band between 600 and 1,600 meters and makes it possible to utilize them for broadcasting and other private uses.

It is believed that if broadcasting stations are permitted to utilize wave lengths above 600 meters that it will greatly relieve the present situation and vastly improve the service.

It may take some little time to readjust transmitting and receiving sets to these longer wave lengths, but it is entirely practicable to do so. This is directly in line with Doctor McCuiston's suggestion.

I should be very glad to have the benefit of any further suggestions that the doctor may make to you in the future on this subject.

With assurances of regards I am, yours very truly,

WALLACE H. WHITE, JR.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close?

Mr. BARBOUR. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. What is the section referred to?

The CHAIRMAN. Section 2. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 9, line 15, after "revocation" insert "from any order of the Secretary of Commerce refusing, suspending, or revoking a license or permit the person or corporation whose license or permit is refused or revoked or suspended shall have the right to appeal to a court of competent jurisdiction for review, which court shall have the power to affirm, modify, or revoke such order: Provided, The order of the Secretary of Commerce in refusing, suspending, or revoking such license or permit shall not be suspended pending final action by such court."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, which has just been read.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. A. The actual operation of all transmitting apparatus in any radio station for which a station license is required by this act shall be carried on only by a person holding an operator's license issued hereunder. No person shall operate any such apparatus in such station except under and in accordance with an operator's license issued to him by the Secretary of Commerce.

B. The Secretary of Commerce, in his discretion, may grant special temporary operators' licenses to operators of radio apparatus under such regulations, in such form and under such conditions as he may prescribe, whenever an emergency arises requiring prompt employment of such an operator.

C. An operator's license shall be issued by the Secretary of Commerce in response to a written application therefor, addressed to him, which shall set forth (a) the name, age, and address of the applicant; (b) the date and place of birth; (c) the country of which he is a citizen, and, if a naturalized citizen of the United States, the date and place of naturalization; (d) the previous experience of the applicant in operating radio apparatus; and (e) such other facts or information as may be required by the Secretary of Commerce. Every application shall be signed by the applicant under oath or affirmation.

D. An operator's license shall be issued only to a person who, in the judgment of the Secretary of Commerce, is proficient in the use and operation of radio apparatus and in the transmission and reception of radiograms by telegraphy and telephony. Except in an emergency found by the Secretary of Commerce to exist, an operator's license shall not be granted to any alien, nor shall such a license be granted to a representative of a foreign government.

E. An operator's license shall be in such form as the Secretary of Commerce shall prescribe and may be suspended by him for a period not exceeding two years upon proof sufficient to satisfy him that the licensee (a) has violated any provision of any act or treaty binding on the United States which the Secretary of Commerce is authorized by this act to administer, or of any regulation made by the Secretary under any such act or treaty; or (b) has failed to compel compliance therewith by any unlicensed person under his supervision; or (c) has failed to carry out the lawful orders of the master of the vessel on which he is employed; or (d) has willfully damaged or permitted apparatus to be damaged; or (e) has transmitted superfluous signals or signals containing profane or obscene words or language.

F. A license may be revoked by the Secretary of Commerce upon proof sufficient to satisfy him that the licensee was at the date his license was granted to him, or is at the time of revocation, ineligible or unfit for a license.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RAMSEYER). The gentleman from California offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BARBOUR: Page 10, line 19, strike out the period and insert a semicolon and the words: "Provided, That operators engaged in the emergency operation of radio telephones used solely in the private business of any person, company, or corporation as incidental to such business shall not be required to be proficient in the transmission and reception of radiograms by telegraphy."

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the reason that I think the requirements specified in paragraph D on page 10 are too strict to cover all cases. Paragraph D provides as follows:

An operator's license shall be issued only to a person who, in the judgment of the Secretary of Commerce, is proficient in the use and operation of radio apparatus and in the transmission and reception of radiograms by telegraphy and telephony.

I will state that I had a talk with the author of the bill yesterday and suggested to him that the bill be amended by permitting operators of radiotelephones in private business to have licenses issued to them without the requirement that they be proficient in radiotelegraphy. The author of the bill stated to me a very good reason why that should not be permitted in all cases, so I have limited my amendment to emergency cases. The particular enterprises that I have in mind are the power companies of the West. Those of you who are familiar with the operations of our power companies in that section know that a large part of our power is hydroelectric and is developed back in the high mountains. They string their telephone lines along on the power poles back to their substations in the mountains. Frequently storms occur in those sections. Lightning will strike a wire, ice and sleet will form, or one of the power lines will become broken and hang across the telephone line, breaking it down. If the power lines are down, the service which the company is able to give is seriously interfered with. These companies have installed radio broadcasting machines and are using them in these emergencies to communicate with their substations back in the mountains. It is only in cases of this kind that my amendment would apply—to the emergency use of radiotelephones by private companies or persons in their private business. The amendment simply provides that operators of radiophones in such cases shall not be required to be proficient in radiotelegraphy.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUTLER. I notice that subsection D says that an operator's license shall be issued only to a person who, in the judgment of the Secretary of Commerce, is proficient in the use and operation of radio apparatus.

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Does that require any special instruction before he is able to use it?

Mr. BARBOUR. I think it does.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no knowledge at all of radio. I have an apparatus in my house where I am receiving.

Mr. BARBOUR. If you are only receiving you are not required to have an operator's license.

Mr. BUTLER. Let us see. It says:

Proficient in the use and operation of radio apparatus and in the transmission and reception of radiograms by telegraphy and telephony.

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman knows what he is talking about, and I am not informed on this subject.

Mr. BARBOUR. If you are merely operating a receiving set you are not required to have a license.

Mr. BUTLER. Why is the word "reception" in there?

Mr. BARBOUR. I do not know, unless it applies to telegraphy.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The bill does not contemplate that there shall be any license required of a person who is only receiving. That is, you may have in your home a receiving set and you may hear all you please or as little as you are able to without any license from anybody.

Mr. BUTLER. And, therefore, it would not interfere with the privilege I have in mind, of a person having a receiving set in his home?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. No.

Mr. BUTLER. I wondered why they used the word "reception," and whether it refers to the whole bill or not.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Does that amendment obviate the necessity of these companies getting a license from the Secretary of Commerce?

Mr. BARBOUR. No; it provides that the operators or licensees shall not be required to be proficient in telegraphy where they are using private phone outfits only in cases of emergency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARBOUR. During that time I shall ask the Clerk to read an excerpt from an article which recently appeared in the Journal of Electricity bearing upon this very subject, covering my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the Clerk will read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

[From the Journal of Electricity.]

REGULATIONS HAMPERING USE OF RADIO BY POWER COMPANIES.

One of the most useful applications to which the radiotelephone has been adapted is for purposes of emergency communication of load dispatchers in generating stations in case of failure of pole line telephones. Western power companies are all alive to the possibilities of the radiotelephone for emergency-system dispatching; and when conditions are right and the way is clear, considerable use will undoubtedly be made of this method of communication.

Were it not for certain existing Government radio regulations, the problems relating to radiotelephone operators or operating personnel would be quite simple. While there is no particular difficulty attached to the procuring of station licenses or the allotment of wave lengths for this class of communication which comes under the limited commercial classification, the operator's requirements are somewhat stringent, being originally intended for operators of radiotelegraph stations.

Proficiency in the telegraph code is required, as well as an examination in both theory and application of radiotelegraph apparatus, before an operating license can be secured. The imposition of these requirements on a telephone operator does not seem warranted, and it would seem that a revision of the requirements is advisable. The suggestion has been made that the private use of the radiotelephone for emergency dispatching on power systems could very well be handled by licensing one competent engineer to have complete supervision over the licensed stations of his particular system.

It is to be hoped that in the interest of public service some provision will be made to permit the more general use of the radiotelephone for dispatching purposes, as well as for communication with remotely situated construction camps.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I will state that my amendment would simply in case of emergency permit these power companies or any other companies operating a similar business, or any business wherein radiotelephones are used, to have the broadcasting apparatus operated by a man who is not necessarily proficient in telegraphy, which has nothing to do with the operation of a radiotelephone.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I have no quarrel with the gentleman's purpose, but I think the effect of his amendment might be very harmful. Of course, it does not make much difference what the purpose of the originator of a message is. We are concerned with the effect of that message when it gets into the ether. This particular provision was put in the bill out of a regard for safety of life and property at sea. That was the primary purpose of it. If you are familiar at all with the international conventions, with the act of 1912 and the regulations thereunder, you will know that there are various provisions requiring operators to listen in at specified times for S O S messages from ships at sea. Here is the situation: At the power company which the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] has in mind, the minute it starts its message out into the ether it has no control over where it is going; it has no control over what it is to interfere with. The conference originally thought, and the committee agreed, that it was absolutely essential if other provisions of the law were to be observed with respect to listening in and stopping the sending of other messages when S O S messages come in, that the station transmitting messages must be also able to listen in and hear distress signals, whether they come by telephone or by the Morse code, so that the station may obey other provisions of the law designed to promote safety at sea. If the sender of this power company is not able to listen, to hear, and to understand messages coming both by telegraph and telephone, then he can not meet the other provisions of law designed to promote safety at sea.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I assume that the Secretary of Commerce could allocate wave lengths to these different stations. What difference does it make whether the man at an emergency station could understand an S O S or not? He would not be able to help in any event. Could they not give him wave lengths that would not interfere?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Let me illustrate what I have in mind. The particular instance I shall now relate was told to me by a distinguished Member of the House within a very few short hours. A couple of boys got an amateur license for transmitting. They were told that their instrument would carry only 30 miles. They learned the S O S signals of the Morse code, and, thinking they were far inland, away from the coast, and that it would do no harm, they began to transmit the S O S signal with their amateur instrument.

The S O S message was heard by a station many miles away. It was relayed to the coast, and three or four or five destroyers traversed the coast for a number of hours looking for the senders of that S O S message. It might just as well have been a bona fide S O S message as one sent out frivolously by some boys, and it is absolutely vital that all people transmitting may hear and understand these messages.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. It seems to me hardly conceivable that a man stationed at a point in the interior, at an emergency station, would send out that kind of a message.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. It does not make any difference what the character of his message may be, it may interfere with a bona fide S O S message, or a bona fide S O S message may be coming in, and if he does not stop transmitting he may prevent the reception of it by the station for which it was intended.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Even though using different wave lengths?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes; within limits.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. I would like to have the gentleman tell me whether a radio telephone operator, for instance, in one of these stores in Washington—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARBOUR. Suppose an operator were operating a radio telephone in one of these stores in Washington that gives concerts and sends out radiograms. Would he be able to hear, would he have the necessary apparatus, or would his apparatus convey to him a distress message sent out by a ship at sea?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes; and in any event he ought to, because he can directly interfere with all S O S messages at sea all along this coast, and that is the purpose of this provision, and of a subsequent provision in the bill, to make sure that a station transmitting, whether by telegraph or telephone, is so equipped that it can hear S O S messages and stop transmitting.

Mr. BARBOUR. When he is broadcasting is he also listening?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. He must be listening, he must have an operator listening in so that he may stop his transmitting in order to comply with the provisions of the law in order that S O S messages may be effective.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I offer the following amendment: Page 10, line 25, strike out the words "two years" and insert "one year."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 25, strike out the words "two years" and insert in lieu thereof "one year."

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I was surprised beyond expression at the view which some of the committee, and especially some of the lawyers on the committee, took in reference to the amendment relating to the right of a man to have his day in court. My amendment simply provided if a man had his license refused or had his license canceled he should have the right to have it reviewed by a court of competent jurisdiction, and in the meantime that the Secretary's orders should remain in full force and effect. Now if I had said if he violated a regulation of the department, that would have been a different proposition. The instances which the gentleman cited were instances in which regulations had been violated. Of course, that should be a matter for the discretion of the Secretary. In the grain futures bill the Secretary of agriculture is permitted to make general regulations, and there is no appeal from those regulations; but if peradventure the Secretary should say that the grain exchanges shall close, that bill gives the right on the part of the grain exchanges to go into court and challenge the Secretary's order. Likewise in the packers' bill the regulations are purely in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture in no place is given power absolutely to say the packers shall not operate. When he says that, the bill provides the packer may go into a court—go into an impartial tribunal where every man is supposed to meet on a common level—and have his rights adjudicated. In other words, it was the purpose of the provisions that we put in those two bills to see that we did not confiscate a man's property or right to do business without the privilege of being heard in court. The Secretary of the Interior simply on the violation of a little regulation as, for instance, the transmission of superfluous signals, may say that a man who has devoted his life to the radio business may not have the right to pursue his occupation for a period of two years. Not only that; if you turn over to section 4, page 11, it reads:

After the approval of this act the construction of a station for which a license is required by this act shall not be begun—

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that section has not been read.

Mr. JONES of Texas (reading)—

Nor shall the construction of a station already begun be continued—

If the gentleman desires to make that point, I shall make the point of no quorum.

Mr. HICKS. The gentleman is only reading that for information; it is part of his argument.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point of order?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. JONES of Texas (reading)—

Nor shall the construction of a station already begun be continued until after a permit for its construction has been granted by the Secretary of Commerce upon written application therefor.

Here may be a bunch of four or five men who have gone in together, forming an organization, perhaps a little corporation or a partnership, and they have spent $100,000 and have their station nearly completed, yet we are putting the power in the hands of the Secretary of Commerce to say they shall not complete that station and shall not send out a message and there is no appeal. By that very act, if the Secretary of Commerce in his busy operation should be imposed on or if some clerk should make a mistake, the men or corporation would have their rights confiscated without the right of review by a court.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. KNUTSON. What is the gentleman's request?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KNUTSON. I shall object to any more extensions after the gentleman has finished.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has the floor and he has been granted an extension of five minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. I shall object to any further extension.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Gentlemen of the committee, I would not make an effort to say that if some regulation might be violated a man should have the right to carry up matters in court. That is a different proposition altogether, but there are men all over this broad, big country who have put money into this thing. There are men all over this country who have devoted years of study to a mastery of the radio business. Now you are placing in the hands of the Secretary of Commerce the right to say to that man who has spent years of his life in the mastery of the business, "You shall no longer conduct the business of your choice. You shall not have the right to go to any court to have my edict reviewed. I am settling this matter fully and finally." That is the matter that you placed in the hands of the Secretary of Commerce, who is already a busy man and who can not perform the functions of a court and in many instances may not even be a lawyer.

I understand the present Secretary of Commerce is not a judge; he is not capable of passing on the legal rights of a man or a set of men. Here is a proposition that means confiscation and ruin to a man if it should be imposed upon him. I again suggest that the illustration that the gentleman gave of the Bureau of Navigation was purely a question of regulation, not the destruction of a man's business. I purposely limited the amendment which I offered before to the simple question of refusing or revoking a license to a person to operate and refusing a license to a station to operate. Surely, if a man has a station in which he may have invested $5,000 or $100,000, and some man who is in the position of Secretary of Commerce should make an error or commit a wrong, that man should have the right to appeal to a court of competent jurisdiction. We may not always in the future have in the office of Secretary of Commerce a man who is so wise and so dependable as the one we have now. We do not know. But a man should have the right to appeal to a court of competent jurisdiction which would determine his rights in accordance with the rules and regulations based upon the procedure in a court. Gentlemen, law is based on reason. It is based on human experience. It is the result of centuries of effort on the part of the brightest men whom the race has produced to produce legal rules of procedure that will deal justice between man and man, and that right should be given to a man under these circumstances.

Now, in view of the fact that the committee has voted down my amendment, I am offering an amendment to the effect that if an operator shall violate one of these provisions, the Secretary may suspend him for only one year, instead of two years. Here might be a man who violated some regulation laid down in this paragraph, and the Secretary decides to suspend him for an indefinite period. I think, in view of the fact that you are putting the determination finally in the hands of the Secretary of Commerce, one year would be a reasonable time for the limit of suspension.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that debate has already spread over the next section, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. A. After the approval of this act the construction of a station for which a license is required by this act shall not be begun, nor shall the construction of a station already begun be continued until after a permit for its construction has been granted by the Secretary of Commerce upon written application therefor. This application shall set forth such facts as the Secretary of Commerce by regulation may prescribe as to the citizenship, character, and the financial, technical, and other ability of the applicant to construct and operate the station, the ownership and location of the proposed station and of the station or stations with which it is proposed to communicate, the wave length or wave lengths desired to be used, the hours of the day or other periods of time during which it is proposed to operate the station, the purpose for which the station is to be used, the type of transmitting apparatus to be used, the power to be used, the date upon which the station is expected to be completed and in operation, and such other information as the Secretary of Commerce may require. Such application shall be signed by the applicant under oath or affirmation.

B. Such permit for construction shall show specifically the earliest and latest dates between which the actual operation of such station is expected to begin and shall provide that said permit will be automatically forfeited if the station is not ready for operation within the time specified, unless prevented by strikes, riots, acts of God, or other causes not under the control of the grantee. The rights granted under any such permit shall not be assigned, or otherwise transferred to any person, persons, company, or corporation, without the approval of the Secretary of Commerce: Provided, That a permit for construction shall not be required for Government stations or for private stations as provided for in section 4, fifteenth regulation, of the act of August 13, 1912. The granting of this permit to construct a station as herein required shall not of itself be construed to impose any duty or obligation upon the Secretary to issue a license for the operation of such station.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. TILSON. I do so for the purpose of propounding a unanimous-consent request. I called the attention of the committee the other day to the fact that there is a real difficulty in regard to the numbering of the sections of this bill. It can not be entirely adjusted until we reach the last paragraph, but there are certain changes that ought to be made here, which reach back to the very beginning of the bill. I therefore ask unanimous consent that for the purpose of properly numbering the sections, or, if necessary, changing the numbering of the sections of the bill, we be permitted to return to any part of the bill that has been read without losing the right to do so. I have gone into this matter with the enrolling clerk and with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE], and I think we have contrived a plan whereby we arrange the section numbers as they should be.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I wish to inquire of the gentleman if the gentleman has gone over the matter with the ranking Members of the majority?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE] and with the enrolling clerk.

Mr. BLANTON. Why not ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to number the sections in accordance with the established precedents?

Mr. TILSON. It would not be in order until the last section is reached, unless by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the reading of the bill it shall be in order to return to any section or any part of the bill for the purpose of offering amendments only as to the numbering thereof.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Connecticut has very kindly given this matter his personal attention, why should it not be done now?

Mr. BLANTON. It can be done now, and should be.

Mr. TILSON. I will avail of the opportunity suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, and will send to the Clerk's desk a unanimous-consent request that we be permitted to rearrange the numbering of the section, if necessary, or at least correctly numbering the sections of the bill, and for that purpose to return to the earlier portions of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to offer amendments to change the numbering of the sections, and for that purpose to return to the prior portions of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. ROACH. Reserving the right to object, I will not object, because I can see that the bill is improperly numbered by sections, and that is the point I made a moment ago, and that reason justifies me, in my opinion, in offering an amendment.

Mr. TILSON. As the Chairman has said, it is technically all one section, and that was not the intention of the authors of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask by way of amending the gentleman's request that the Clerk be authorized to change the numbering of the sections of the bill in accordance with the agreement reached by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE], which is in accordance with the precedents.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut accept the substitute motion of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. TILSON. I do not. I think the amendment I have prepared will settle it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. TOWNER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Connecticut if action taken now would not possibly make it necessary to take subsequent action regarding subsequent paragraphs? Would it not be better to wait until the whole bill is completed, so that it can all be done at one time?

Mr. TILSON. It will not change anything except the quotation marks throughout the bill, except in the last paragraph where it refers to repealing of certain sections. I am offering two amendments, one now, by unanimous consent, to clear up all of the bill except the last section. The other will be offered to the last section when we reach it. That will straighten out the entire matter.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Reserving the right to object, how much time will it take?

Mr. TILSON. About one minute, if the gentleman from Texas will allow us to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The clerk will report the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TILSON: Page 1, after line 2, after the word "assembled" strike out the amendment heretofore inserted. Also strike out "Section 1" in line 7, and the quotation marks before each paragraph of the bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] will not modify his amendment by inserting "the words" before "Section 1"?

Mr. TILSON. That is the purpose of the amendment. The words "Section 1" are in quotation marks. Gentlemen, that will do what we are attempting to do, except as to the last paragraph, which will receive proper attention when reached.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I was not asking merely that it be in quotation marks.

Mr. TILSON. The words "Section 1" in quotation marks should come out, and the quotation marks at the beginning of the paragraphs all the way through the bill should come out. That is what my amendment accomplishes.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: On page 13, line 1, after the figures "1912," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee in charge of this bill if he thinks it would be quite right to authorize a man or a company to construct a station and then say that there would not be any obligation on his part to consider that fact in passing on whether to grant a license to operate that station. Does that seem fair?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think the language is right as it now is. The man is in a better condition with this provision adopted than he is under existing law. The situation is this: A man might be granted a permit to construct a station—

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes. Let us assume that that is done.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Let us assume that that is done. Then, between the time of that permit and the completion of that station and the time for the consideration of his case the man might have violated all manner of rules and regulations and provisions, and it might be apparent to everybody that it was absolutely undesirable and improper that he should have a license. We want to determine the question as of that time, and we might not want to permit him to proceed.

Mr. JONES of Texas. To strike out this provision will not prevent the Secretary from determining it as of that time. All that I am trying to do is to strike out that provision which says:

The granting of this permit to construct a station as herein required shall not of itself be construed to impose any duty or obligation upon the Secretary to issue a license for the operation of such station.

That language can go out and the Secretary still has full power to license or revoke, and I can not see any good purpose to be served in having such language follow the provision which authorizes the Secretary to grant the power to construct. Here you turn around and say that that fact shall not be construed as any obligation. You can strike that out and the Secretary will still have his full power of passing on the merits of the case.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I may say for the information of the gentleman that that was put in there by the committee, and the words "of itself" in line 2 were put in at the request of people who now have stations.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Why do they want the provision in there at all? Do they want to keep somebody else from building stations?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The situation is just this—of course, this whole paragraph is intended to relieve the Secretary from undue and what we consider improper pressure. As the situation now is, a man or a group of men—

Mr. JONES of Texas. It is to give further rights to the Secretary. It is not to protect the radio man but to protect the Secretary.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. It is to protect the public. As the situation now is, any corporation may go ahead and spend an indefinite amount of money in the erection of a station, in the assembling of the physical part of the plant, and in the assembling of its technical body of employees—

Mr. JONES of Texas. And then—

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I should like to finish my statement.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not want the gentleman to take all my time. The very statement of the gentleman is to the effect that here may be a man who has built his plant, has constructed it under a permit from the Secretary of Commerce; and yet the gentleman wants not only to give the full power in the hands of the Secretary but to say that the granting of that permit to build shall not impose any obligation or duty whatever to consider that fact in connection with granting a license to operate. It does seem to me that if the Secretary under these broad powers has given a company or a man notice that they may go ahead, that he may construct a station, that ought to be some persuasive argument, to say the least, that he should be granted a license to operate that station. Here is the point I am making—that if you do not give them that leeway, you certainly will put this in the hands of those people who have already tried to get control of the situation, and who have already constructed stations; because with that provision in the law no man is going to put any more money into a proposition of this kind if even when he builds a station under a permit he can not have any assurance that he will be permitted to operate.

May I suggest in this connection that there are very serious doubts as to the constitutionality of certain powers conferred in this bill. There is no doubt of the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, but that does not authorize legislation that would destroy that commerce or business. There is a distinction in legislation forbidding interstate shipments of liquors and narcotics—businesses that have inherent vices—and in prohibiting interstate business that is in its nature and essence legitimate. Here are broad powers in the exercise of which the Secretary might, if he saw fit, refuse any or all licenses and permits, and thus totally destroy all interstate activities in radio broadcasting. This, it seems to me, goes beyond the mere question of regulation.

Mr. EDMONDS. If a man could get a license to build a station anywhere he pleased, what would prevent one of these big corporations from seizing all the available localities and taking out permits and keeping them perpetually in their control?

Mr. JONES of Texas. The Secretary is given broad powers in other places of the bill to control who shall have a permit and who shall have a license; but here is the proposition: Here are the four big companies I mentioned awhile ago, which have a practical monopoly of this situation at the present time, apparently. You are putting a provision in the bill by the terms of which no man will dare enter into a business of this kind, no banker will dare advance money to a man who desires to go into the business, because, even though he does all he can, even though he goes down to the Secretary of Commerce and gets permission to construct this building, that fact is not persuasive, according to the language of the bill, on the Secretary of Commerce; but he can go ahead and say that it does not make any difference whatever. In fact, he is instructed to say that.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. If the gentleman's amendment be adopted, would it as a matter of fact change the situation any?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; it would leave the persuasive facts in this way: Suppose you gave me permission to construct a building. You are in control. I go ahead and construct it. If there are no instructions to you under the terms of the bill not to consider that fact when I go to get my license, you will be persuaded to some extent by the fact that you have licensed me; but now they instruct the Secretary that the granting of a permit to construct a station shall not of itself be construed to impose any duty at all. The fact that he may have constructed a station does not impose any duty whatever to consider that.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. This general provision was inserted in the bill, as I undertook to say a moment ago, in order to prevent ill-considered and unwise and unrestrained construction. As the law now is, any group of persons, any corporation, may proceed to erect a station wheresoever they see fit; they may spend an unlimited amount of money in the construction of the station itself; they may put into it the physical apparatus essential for the operation of a station, gather together their technical force, and then after having spent anywhere from $1,000 to $1,000,000 they can come down here to the Secretary of Commerce and say, "Here is what we have done; we have spent this money; we are ruined unless you give us this license," and they can practically force the hand of the Secretary of Commerce to grant a license. This provision is put in here so that there shall be some preliminary check, as I said, on ill-considered construction and so that in the first instance they may not go ahead and make these expenditures and get the Secretary into a position where he must as a matter of course yield to their importunities for a license. We recognize that the Secretary might grant a permit for a license, the station might be constructed, and then intervening events may happen which would make it impossible or improper for the Secretary to act further in the matter, and we simply put in this last clause as a saving clause so that there would be no presumption of obligation resting on the Secretary to go further in the matter, unless he then thought it was proper to issue the license, and that is all this does.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I am supporting the bill, and my view is the same the gentleman entertains, so far as the question of appeal is concerned. Aside from the particular point to which the gentleman has just referred I call the attention of the gentleman to the provision in subsection (b), on page 12, to the effect that if the construction of the plant is not completed within the date specified automatically the permit shall expire, except in certain contingencies.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It seems to me that is a very drastic provision, and that the Secretary himself would wish to have a more liberal provision, one which would permit him to extend the time for construction in cases which in his opinion would justify him in doing so.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The purpose of the committee was this: We did not want these permits kicking around underfoot indefinitely. We wanted them to have a definite life, and so we incorporated this provision in the bill. I think the situation may be met by a new application and a new permit.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Looking at the provision, the difficulty is that a man gets a permit, and, exceeding the time a little bit, is in default through causes which may have been technically within his control and yet not actually within his control, and he forfeits his permit automatically. He has to start over again.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. That is the provision; and we think he will be taken care of in the first instance by setting the last date far enough ahead into the future.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. If I understand it, the gentleman's contention is that even with the language as the committee has carried it, and especially with the words "of itself," the fact of granting a permit would still be a persuasive argument in favor of granting a license, and that the only purpose is that it shall not be conclusive.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Absolutely; and we assume that where a permit has been granted and there has been no radical change in the situation that the license will follow as a matter of course. But we do recognize that there may be a change in the situation of the parties or a change in the art or some other circumstance that would make it absolutely improper for the license to be granted.

Mr. BURTNESS. Of course, if the words were omitted, I presume that the situation would not be conclusive.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. No; but we are putting these in out of an abundance of caution.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If we now drop out this provision, it might be argued that the House disagreed with the purpose of these lines and intended that the Secretary of Commerce should feel some obligation to grant a license, and I think that would be dangerous.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is of very great importance. If the position of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE] is correct, then you do not need the language, because the Secretary would have all that power without the language which I offer to strike out. Under the terms as written, we are practically instructing the Secretary of Commerce that even though he may have issued a permit to construct a station or a building, that that fact shall not be considered by him in determining whether he will permit its operation.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Not at all.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is the practical meaning of the language. If you strike out this language he still has all the powers to grant or refuse the license or permit that he now has, but after you authorize him to control licenses and permits you put this provision in the bill:

The granting of this permit to construct a station as herein required shall not of itself be construed to impose any duty or obligation upon the Secretary to issue a license for the operation of such station.

With that provision in the bill no new concern can afford to go into the radio business. The American Telegraph & Telephone Co., through its arrangement with the General Electric, the Westinghouse Co., and the Radio Corporation are trying to get control of this situation. No doubt they would like a law so worded that nobody else would engage in the business. If we put in a provision to the effect that if a man builds a station with a permit from the Secretary of Commerce that fact shall not be considered in his favor in passing on the question of licensing him, there is not anybody who will go into the business. A man would be a fool, a consummate fool, if he put money into a radio corporation or plant or into any kind of a station if he knew he would operate under a law which instructed the Secretary of Commerce that the fact that he had constructed a plant with the permission of the Secretary of Commerce should not militate in his favor. It is a monstrous proposition, it seems to me. Of course you can not get money unless you have credit. What institution would advance money on such uncertainties?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Virginia: After the word "unless," in line 18, page 12, strike out the remainder of line 18 and all of line 19 to the end of the sentence and insert: "prevented by causes which in the opinion of the Secretary justify him in extending the time."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. An advisory committee is hereby established to whom the Secretary of Commerce shall refer for examination and report such matters as he may deem proper relating to: (a) The administration or changes in the laws, regulations, and treaties of the United States relating to radio communication; (b) the study of the scientific problems involved in radio communication, with the view of furthering its development; (c) the scientific progress in radio communication and use of radio communication.

The advisory committee shall consist of 15 members, of whom one shall be designated by the Secretary of State, one by the Secretary of the Treasury, one by the Secretary of War, one by the Secretary of the Navy, one by the Secretary of Agriculture, one by the Postmaster General, one by the Secretary of Commerce, and one by the chairman of the United States Shipping Board, to represent these departments, respectively, and seven members of recognized attainment in radio communication not otherwise employed in the Government service, to be designated by the Secretary of Commerce.

The necessary expenses of the members of the committee in going to, returning from, and while attending meetings of the committee, including clerical expenses and supplies, together with a per diem of $25 to each of the six members not otherwise employed in the Government service, for attendance at the meetings, shall be paid from the appropriation made to the Department of Commerce for this purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph on the top of page 14, for the reason, indirectly, it is an appropriation in direct conflict with section 5 of Rule XXI of this House—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that if there was an appropriation existing for this character of activity it would be a very close question, indeed, whether the paragraph would not be violative of the rule forbidding any appropriations to be reported on a bill from a legislative committee. But as this advisory committee is a new institution entirely, for which no appropriation could have been carried heretofore, the Chair has no difficulty whatever in holding that it is not subject to the objection raised by the gentleman from Texas. If there had been in existence an advisory committee and an appropriation carried in existing law from which this fund could be paid, then it would be an indirect appropriation; but as there is no advisory committee existing and no appropriation available at the present time for that purpose it will require a distinctive appropriation to entitle these persons to their per diem as provided in this paragraph—

Mr. BLANTON. The Chair has not heard me. I am sure the Chair will let me finish.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair may not allow the gentleman to finish but will accord a respectful hearing to the gentleman if the gentleman so desires.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to be heard for a moment further.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman further.

Mr. HICKS. Did the Chair render his decision?

Mr. BLANTON. The Secretary of Commerce now grants radio licenses; the Secretary of Commerce now has an advisory committee on the radio question; the Secretary of Commerce has an appropriation from which he pays that advisory committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman call the attention of the Chair to the appropriation which authorizes the Secretary of Commerce to pay any advisory committee?

Mr. BLANTON. He is paying it out of a lump-sum appropriation now granted in the appropriation bill making appropriations for the present fiscal year for the Department of Commerce. Now I want to call the attention of the Chair to the language. It does not say appropriations "to be made" for this department, something which would be an authorization in the future, but it says appropriation "made" to the Department of Commerce for this purpose, which is in the past tense, something which has been already done, an appropriation that is in existence, not something that is in the future, which makes it an indirect appropriation; and I call the attention of the Chair to this, that it involves a broader question than this particular bill. There is another bill to come from this committee that is in the same identical fix that makes an indirect appropriation of $50,000 out of money that is now in a revolving fund, and I want to submit to the Chair that his decision goes further than this bill and should have careful consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be inclined to hold that it would be subject to the rule prohibiting appropriations being carried on a legislative bill if there was an appropriation now existing authorizing the expenditure of this fund. But as this is a new activity that has not been heretofore authorized by law, the Chair concludes that there is no such appropriation, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "six" at the end of line 4, on page 14, and insert the word "seven." That is a clerical error.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITE of Maine: Page 14, line 4, at the end of the line, strike out the word "six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "seven."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TILSON: Page 14, line 3, after the word "committee," strike out all the remainder of line 3, all of lines 4 and 5, and all of line 6 down to and including the word "meetings."

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment simply cuts out the provision for clerical expenses, supplies, and the per diem of $25 each to seven members not otherwise employed in the Government service, and leaves in the provision for the payment of the necessary expenses of the committee in going to and returning from and while attending the meetings. It seems to me that this is fair, and that we ought to pay such expenses.

Mr. BLANTON. I suggest to the gentleman from Maine that he accept that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROACH: Strike out all of section 5 down to and including the word "to" in line 8, page 13, and in lieu thereof insert the following: "An advisory committee is hereby established. Said advisory committee is hereby given full power and authority to review any decision, order, rule, or regulation made or issued by the Secretary of Commerce under the provisions of this act upon the written request so to do of any person, company, or corporation affected thereby, and upon such review the said advisory committee is hereby given full power and authority to confirm, modify, or reverse the action of the Secretary of Commerce with respect to any such decision, order, rule, or regulation. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of Commerce when any such review is requested in writing to immediately refer to said advisory committee the decision, rule, or regulation made or issued upon which a review is requested. Said advisory committee shall have full power and authority to and then shall immediately make such review and certify the results thereof to the Secretary of Commerce, and the decision therein made by said advisory committee shall be final. The Secretary of Commerce shall also refer to said advisory committee for examination and report such matters as he may deem proper relating to."

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am going to take only a moment of the committee's time in discussing this amendment. I want to say to the committee that I am for this legislation, and I shall be for it whether this amendment is adopted or not but I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that we are dealing now with legislation that covers a great, big subject and affects a multitude of people—subject that is just in its infancy, undeveloped—and yet we are placing in the hands of one man arbitrary power and control over that vast subject, the subject of radio throughout the United States and its control.

Attention has been called to a recent act of this Congress, known as the packers' bill, subjecting the five great packing concerns of this country to regulation, supervision, and control, and that the right of appeal was granted in that instance. That is true. But here we have a subject affecting 110,000,000 people of this country, and we are placing the final decision of all questions relating to that subject—a new and undeveloped subject—in the hands of one man, with absolutely no appeal or review from any decision that he might render or any rule or regulation that he might issue affecting this matter. I believe that is going too far.

It seems to me that if the committee was willing to have an advisory committee as provided in this bill, and intrust to its consideration certain matters which are authorized to be referred to the committee for its consideration, they would likewise be willing for the committee to review and consider decisions, rules, and regulations made by the Secretary of Commerce, because no harm can certainly be done by it, as under the terms of the bill they are to be men who are informed on the subject that we are now legislating upon, and of which we ourselves know but very little, and I doubt if the Secretary of Commerce knows much more about it than we do.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will it annoy the gentleman for me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROACH. No; not at all.

Mr. BUTLER. Under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] no compensation is allowed to these men, although they might sit all the time. The committee has agreed to pay them their expenses.

Mr. ROACH. If we have an advisory committee, and it has proper functions and powers, it will take cognizance of all this subject. The bill so provides. It seems to me there are certain matters that the Secretary of Commerce should refer to the committee from time to time. I am leaving that in the bill, namely, that the Secretary shall refer to this committee the study of scientific problems involved in radio communication, with a view to its further development; scientific progress in radio communication and its use, and so forth.

This particularly fits and qualifies the advisory committee to go into the question of any decision that the Secretary of Commerce may render. This particularly fits and qualifies the advisory committee to pass upon the wisdom of any rule or regulation that the Secretary of Commerce may issue, because they are studying the subject from a scientific standpoint. They are men who are qualified to study the subject to begin with, and they are peculiarly fitted and qualified to say whether the decision or rule or regulation issued by the Secretary of Commerce is a wise one. Here is a subject that covers the air of the United States, that affects 110,000,000 people. New conditions are constantly arising. Developments are being made in this subject every day. Yet we are looking into the future and saying that this one man, who knows no more about it perhaps than we know, shall be allowed to make a final decision, and that his decision, whether arbitrary or not, shall be conclusive. It has been my experience and observation that when final and arbitrary power is placed in the hands of one man it is a mistake, no matter who that man is, and I am not willing to do that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROACH. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under the gentleman's amendment, would any of these members of the advisory committee be appointed by the Secretary himself?

Mr. ROACH. Yes; one member is to be appointed by the Secretary. Here are the members of the advisory committee, as now provided for in the bill. They are set forth in the bill, one to be appointed by the Secretary of State, one by the Secretary of the Treasury, one by the Secretary of War, one by the Secretary of the Navy, one by the Secretary of Agriculture, one by the Postmaster General, one by the Secretary of Commerce, and one by the chairman of the United States Shipping Board.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. ROACH. These departments are all now operating great radio stations, and the men to be named on the advisory committee are peculiarly qualified to pass upon the wisdom of the decisions of the Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. It proposes an advisory committee of 15 men. I submit to the members of this House that if we give to that body of 15 men the power to review every action of the Secretary of Commerce, then we will never see anything done. It is absolutely necessary that there shall be action, and speedy action—I have said this over and over again—if we are to bring order out of the intolerable condition that exists to-day; and if every act of the Secretary must be reviewed by 15 men, who may have to be brought here from all sections of the country, then you will get nothing done.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ROACH. This only requires the act of the Secretary from which an appeal is taken to be reviewed by the advisory committee.

Mr. BUTLER. But they will have to sit all the time. You can not get anybody to serve.

Mr. ROACH. I do not assume that every act of the Secretary is subject to review by this board, unless it is requested by the party affected.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I think that the committee on reflection will agree with me that if it had been decided to be advisable to have any board of review or appellate jurisdiction in matters of the discretion of the Secretary, it certainly would have been infinitely better to have had an appeal to the courts of the country rather than to this nondescript, nonjudicial organization that is proposed here by the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROACH]. No machinery is provided; no rules and regulations or provisions are made for this organization, and in view of the apparent judgment of the committee already expressed to have no review I think it would be particularly unwise to grant that power of review to such an organization as is here proposed. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROACH].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 6. Radio telephone stations, the signals of which can interfere with ship communication, are required to keep a licensed radio operator, of a class to be determined by the Secretary of Commerce, listening in on the wave length designated for distress signals during the entire period the transmitter of such station is in operation.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of saying just a word, and I think I am through when I have finished these remarks.

I am very anxious, as every one of us is, to see the radio business developed as rapidly as possible and as freely as possible. It seems to me that gentlemen have rushed into legislation in the hope of curing a situation by legislation that is not curable in that manner. Under the law as we have it to-day we have a licensing system, so that any person or company desiring to engage in the business under the act of 1912 must secure a license. Under the powers granted in that bill, in section 2, every license shall be in such form and under such regulations as the Secretaries of Commerce and Labor may make. They can regulate the wave lengths and make any other regulations they see fit, and revoke the license of anybody who violates those regulations. They have issued a hundred pages of regulations. Now, the trouble has not been a matter of legislation. They have more power now in the hands of the Secretaries of Commerce and Labor than they are exercising. The trouble with this situation has been the confusion that has arisen over the tremendous growth of this business. This business has just gotten top-heavy by virtue of its tremendous growth. You can not clear up this confusion simply by passing a lot of legislation, especially when it is in line with powers heretofore that are not even now being exercised in full by the departments now in power.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In view of the universal protests that we are receiving from all the people of the country who are interested in this matter, is the gentleman content—

Mr. JONES of Texas. Not at all.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Wait a moment until I ask my question. Is the gentleman content that this Congress, and possibly the next Congress, shall sit supinely by and make no effort to correct it by legislation, but that we shall wait until we have the ultimate last word in radio legislation?

Mr. JONES of Texas. If the gentleman had been here the other day, he would have seen most clearly that that is not what I want to do. But we have legislation now giving more power than they are exercising. The committee, in their report, confess that this bill does not cover the situation; that they have not the facts by which they can cover the field; that they must bring in a makeshift measure here in the closing days of Congress, when it can not be given thorough consideration. When you once get a bill through which, according to its terms, will practically permit monopoly, then it is going to be hard to secure legislation of a proper kind. What I advocated the other day was that we let this go over until the next session, and in the meantime get all the facts we can which will enable us to handle the bill in a reasonable way, and in a way that will clear up this confusion. You are not going to clear up the confusion that has arisen under one bill by simply passing another bill which more or less elaborates what you have in the first bill, and, in addition thereto, has more strings around it and will tend to make confusion worse. Of course, I do not want the confusion to continue, but I want legislation passed here after the facts are fully developed.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Does not the gentleman think that this gives human life greater security?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Oh, I do not think any such question as that is involved here. Here is the trouble with this measure. Under several sections I have read you are tending to discourage anybody from investing anything in the radio business. You are going to blanket it around in such a way that a man can not afford to engage in this business; an independent concern can not, and, at the same time, you have a measure that I do not believe will clear up the confusion, but will simply further the efforts of some of those trying to get control of the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by printing therein a proposed amendment to a bill which is to be considered to-morrow, the amendment being prepared by the committee, to be offered as a committee amendment, of which there has been no print.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, is that something that can be done in Committee of the Whole? Should not that be done in the House? I have no objection to it myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that just as a Member may proceed out of order in debate in Committee of the Whole, so may he extend his remarks out of order, by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, the following is a committee amendment to section 202, subdivision (c), paragraph (1), intended to be offered to H. R. 13774 in lieu of lines 6, 7, 8, and 9, on page 1.

The part printed in 8-point type is the existing law; the part printed in small capitals is the amendment proposed to the existing law, and is submitted for the convenience of the Members.

"(1) When any such property, held for investment or for productive use in trade or business (not including stock in trade or other property held primarily for sale, AND IN THE CASE OF PROPERTY HELD FOR INVESTMENT, NOT INCLUDING STOCKS, BONDS, NOTES, CHOSES IN ACTION, CERTIFICATES OF TRUST OR BENEFICIAL INTEREST, OR OTHER SECURITIES OR EVIDENCES OF INDEBTEDNESS OR INTEREST), is exchanged for property of a like kind or use."

RADIO COMMUNICATION.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized and directed to charge, and through the imposition of stamp taxes on applications, licenses, or other documents, or in other appropriate manner, to collect the fees specified in the schedule following. The Secretary shall collect said fees through the collectors of customs or other officers designated by him, and he may make such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

SCHEDULE OF FEES TO BE COLLECTED FOR TRANSMITTING STATIONS AND OPERATORS' LICENSES.

For transoceanic radio station license, $300 per annum; for commercial land station license, other than transoceanic, 1 kilowatt transmitter input or less, $50 per annum; and for each kilowatt or fraction thereof, $5 per annum; for ship station license, $25 per annum; for experiment station license, $25 per annum; for technical and training school station license, $15 per annum; for special amateur station license, $10 per annum; for general and restricted amateur station license, $2.50 per annum; for commercial extra first-class operator's license, $2.50 per annum; for commercial first-class operator's license, $1.50 per annum; for commercial second-class operator's license, $1 per annum; for commercial cargo grade operator's license, 50 cents per annum; for experiment and instruction grade operator's license, $1 per annum; for amateur first-grade operator's license, 50 cents per annum; for amateur second-grade operator's license, 50 cents per annum; for commercial extra first-class radio operator's examination for license, $2.50 for each examination; for commercial first-class radio operator's examination for license, $2 for each examination; for commercial second-class radio operator's examination for license, $1.50 for each examination; for commercial cargo grade radio operator's examination for license, $1 for each examination; for experiment and instruction grade radio operator's examination for license, $1 for each examination; for amateur first-grade radio operator's examination for license, $1 for each examination; for amateur second-grade radio operator's examination for license, 50 cents for each examination.

In the event that other classes of station and operators' licenses or other examinations shall hereafter be prescribed in any lawful manner, the Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized and directed to charge and collect in the same manner as herein provided fees for such new classes of licenses and of examinations, which fees shall be substantially of the amount herein specified for the license and examination nearest in character and purpose to the new license or examination so prescribed.

For failure to pay at the time and in the manner specified by the Secretary of Commerce any of the above fees the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to refuse to issue such licenses; or, if issued, to suspend or revoke the same, as he may deem proper.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. We will pass this bill, I presume, in about 5 or 10 minutes, but before it passes I think we ought to wipe away a few of the cobwebs that our friends have interwoven into the argument. It has been suggested here that because certain ordinary Members of Congress who have sought to take part in this debate have insisted that there should be a court review for aggrieved parties where licenses have been revoked, denied, or suspended, they were operating in conjunction with certain big corporations simply because the corporations were the only ones to ask for that relief. Who else has had a chance to ask for the relief? Who among the thousands of amateurs—

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman want an answer to that question?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a minute—who among the thousands of amateurs in the State of Texas have had an opportunity to appear before the committee and ask for any such relief. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The amateurs are represented before the committee by the heads of their organizations.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the gentleman's mind immediately goes to organizations. There are thousands and thousands of amateurs who have no connection whatever with any organization.

It is the great unorganized mass in the United States that I try to speak for here day after day, men who are not connected with any organization at all.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Does the gentleman know how many amateurs there are and how many of them are in this organization which appeared before the committee?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I thought not.

Mr. BLANTON. But I know this: I know there are amateurs in Maine, that there are amateurs in Illinois, who are not represented by any organization and who are not represented when certain members of an organization appear before the committee.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does the gentleman contend that the committee should hear some sixteen or eighteen thousand of these people?

Mr. BLANTON. No; but that does not keep a Member of Congress from speaking for them.

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh, I realize they have lots of votes.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, whenever one speaks of anything in the presence of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] his mind immediately reverts to the question of votes. There is something besides votes to be thought of. I never think of votes. The votes in my district take care of themselves, and we ought to get our minds away from that subject.

The point I am trying to make is that there is a large number of unorganized citizens in the United States who are interested in the subject, who are going to have their rights taken away from them by this bill, and they will have to sneak up here to the Secretary of Commerce every time they want to turn around, and will then have no recourse to the courts in appealing from his decisions, which might be arbitrary.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] on several occasions during the course of this debate has, in a measure at least, reflected upon the character of consideration our committee gave this bill by asserting that we had rushed in here with a piece of ill-advised and makeshift legislation. I do not resent that on my own account because I am a member of the committee; but, lest his statement might find lodgment somewhere and leave a wrong impression, I think it is due to the committee and the membership of it, and especially to the subcommittee, to say that this whole question of revision of radio laws was first suggested by the President of the United States. He requested the Secretary of Commerce to call a conference of those who are interested in this great problem and who are seeking to remedy the present intolerable situation. That conference met in Washington, sat for a number of days. The personnel of that conference represented every possible element of public interest in this great activity, and they made recommendations to the Secretary of Commerce with reference to an amendment to the existing law of 1912. Instead of giving hasty consideration to this question, our committee held rather exhaustive hearings, to which all men in the country who are interested in this problem were invited to give their suggestions and to make their criticisms of the proposed bill—a bill, mark you, which had found its origin in the recommendations of these interested and public-spirited citizens who met in public conference held under the auspices of the Secretary of Commerce.

After we had given these hearings, after all parties had had the right to be heard, the subcommittee gave consideration to the framing up of this bill. It was subsequently ratified by the full committee; so that, instead of being subject to criticism of my friend from Texas, it seems to me that, taking the usual course of fair and conservative consideration, the committee, acting unanimously, desiring only to serve the public all over the country, have brought in a bill which, in our judgment, will in a measure remedy but not, of course, necessarily solve all the perplexing problems involved in this radio business.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. For a brief question.

Mr. JONES of Texas. If I left the impression the committee did not try to get the facts—

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman did not only leave the impression but my friend made the charge—

Mr. JONES of Texas. Here is what I tried to say, and the committee itself in its report said, that the facts had not fully developed, that this was a growing business and had not been fully developed—

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the gentleman think the committee should be commended for its candor in that statement?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I certainly do; but they should not have presented a bill of this character in the closing days unless they had all the facts—

Mr. BANKHEAD. The closing days, when legislation is necessary, are as good days as any in which to pass such a measure.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will.

Mr. KNUTSON. This measure is more or less technical. I am sure the committee drafted it after having given months of hearings. Now, would it not be dangerous to try to change the main features of this bill by amendments offered by men who merely had read the bill and who had practically no knowledge of what it contained?

Mr. BANKHEAD. In answer I will say to the gentleman I think the committee has shown pretty fair judgment in declining to accept amendments which were proposed. Now, just this: I am not usually given to indulge in flattery, but I know my friend the genial and able gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE], will accept what I am going to say. I feel that when a man in the public service here, on whichever side of the aisle he may be, has demonstrated by his toil and by his faithfulness and by his ability that he has wrought a real constructive service to his country that acknowledgement of it should properly be made, and I feel sure that I voice the sentiment of this side of the House, especially those who are much interested in this question, when I say that the country, I feel, is indebted to the gentleman from Maine, chairman of this subcommittee, for the fine attention [applause] that he has given to this subject and to this bill, which in a measurable degree at least reflects his zeal and his good judgment in reference to this legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, I wish to supplement what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has just said regarding the perhaps unintentional reflection made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] in regard to this bill. It seems to me that if there ever was a bill brought into this House that had the right kind of consideration, this bill has had it. These gentlemen do not pretend to have arrived at the very last word on radio. Who has? It is greatly to their credit that they have candidly admitted that there is much yet to be learned on the subject. Who among us know more about it? With an earnestness and an industry most commendable this committee has gone to work. Both the majority and minority members, it has made no difference, have worked hand in hand and they have brought in a bill that reflects the very greatest credit upon all members of that committee who had any hand in the preparation of the bill. In addition to this the minority members have come into the House and here on the floor have helped to put this bill through against any opposition that might be brought against it. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that instead of being hasty legislation it has been very well advised. So far as its consideration has been concerned we have spent almost two entire days on it, although it is a short bill. Very few of its provisions have been contested at all. In fact, there have been only a few very minor matters that have been even suggested, after two whole days of debate, and none of these have commended themselves to the better judgment of the Committee of the Whole. It seems to me that the members of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and especially of the subcommittee in charge of this bill are entitled to the most sincere congratulation of every Member of this House for the fine work they have done on this bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in three minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. We are having too much talk altogether.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair state the motion of the gentleman from Illinois. The gentleman from Illinois moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in three minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I just want to rise in view of some things that have been stated. I do not think there is anyone who has more regard for the committee which reported this bill or for their efforts than I have. If in the heat of debate I said anything that reflected upon their activity, I assure them now it was not intentional, and the reference I made to hasty legislation was not intended to convey the impression that the committee did not prepare or did not go into the facts, but I used the word "hasty" in the sense that all the facts of the business have not developed to a point where legislation could be complete; that the facts were now in confusion, that the business was growing at a tremendous rate, and—

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I regret I have not the time; otherwise I would yield. The business is growing at a tremendous rate, and I thought it was hasty to present legislation at this time. I am sure that the members of this committee, who are always earnest and hard working, gave thorough consideration to the measure, and found out all the facts that were obtainable and available at the present time, and have presented a bill that was perhaps the best that could be presented under the facts that are known at the present time. The point I was making was that in view of the tremendous growth and interest in this country of this new art the facts would probably clarify by the next session and a more complete bill could be presented by this committee, which I think is as well qualified as any committee in the House to do that work.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read. The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 10. Wherever the words "naval and military stations" appear in the act to regulate radio communication, approved August 13, 1912, said words "naval and military" shall be stricken out and the word "Government" substituted in place thereof.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment on page 18, line 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITE of Maine: Page 18, line 4, after the word "stations," insert "and naval or military stations."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITE of Maine: Page 18, line 6, at the beginning of the line, insert "and naval or military."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITE of Maine: Page 18, line 6, after the word "Government," insert "owned or operated."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, there is a matter of correction of a word in line 6, page 18, to strike out the word "word" and insert in lieu thereof the word "words."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHINDBLOM: Page 18, line 6, strike out the word "word" and insert in lieu thereof the word "words."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 11. All acts or parts of acts in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TILSON: Page 18, lines 8 and 9, strike out all of section 11 and insert the following: "Sec. 11. Sections 1, 2, and 3 of an act to regulate radio communication, approved August 13, 1912, and all other acts or parts of acts in conflict with this act, are hereby repealed."

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, this completes what I undertook to do earlier in the consideration of the bill so far as correcting the numbering of the sections is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, there remains the question of interior quotes. As printed, all the sections of the bill appear in quotation marks, as if quoted from some other act. As a matter of fact, except sections 1, 2, and 3, they were not quoted from any other act. All the exterior quotation marks have been eliminated. It seems to me that the enrolling clerk should be authorized to put the proper quotation marks on the quotations actually made as the bill now stands. In other words, those are not now interior quotations and therefore should be inclosed within double quotes.

I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to make the proper corrections in punctuation, so far as the quotation marks are concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to make the proper punctuation, so far as quotation marks are concerned only, throughout the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the committee rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STAFFORD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 13773) to amend an act to regulate radio communication, approved August 13, 1912, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put the amendments in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will this bill be the first thing in order to-morrow, after the previous question is ordered, if a demand is made for the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so; yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I have a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. JONES of Texas moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries with the instruction to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment: Page 9, line 15, after the word "revocation," insert a new paragraph as follows:

"From any order of the Secretary of Commerce refusing, suspending, or revoking a license or permit, the person or corporation whose license or permit is refused, suspended, or revoked shall have the right to appeal to a court of competent jurisdiction for review, which court shall have the power to affirm, modify, or revoke such order: Provided, The order of the Secretary of Commerce in refusing, suspending, or revoking such license or permit shall not be suspended pending final action by such court."

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit. The question being taken, the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill. The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. We have two other bills from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can call up any bill that he desires.

FUEL STATION, VIRGIN ISLANDS.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 1771.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up S. 1771, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (S. 1771) to authorize the United States, through the United States Shipping Board, to acquire a site on Hazzell Island, St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, for a fuel and fuel-oil station and fresh-water reservoir for Shipping Board and other merchant vessels, as well as United States naval vessels, and for other purposes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. The bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this bill contains a paragraph which is in violation of clause 5 of Rule XXI, in that it makes an indirect appropriation of money.

The SPEAKER. Of course, the only question is whether an appropriation out of the funds of the Shipping Board is an appropriation within the meaning of the rule.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, this is not an appropriation out of the funds of the Shipping Board, but it is a direction to the Shipping Board to use certain funds already appropriated to the board for the purpose of acquiring the site of an oil-fuel station on the Virgin Islands. In the first place, I should like to call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that this is a Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman state that the appropriation has already been made?

Mr. EDMONDS. A revolving fund for the operation of ships has been placed in the hands of the Shipping Board by Congress. This bill allows them to take a certain sum of money out of that revolving fund to purchase a fuel station on the Virgin Islands. It authorizes them to utilize the money for that purpose. It is an authorization to them.

The contention is that there would be a question as to the use of the appropriation for the purchase or permanent acquisition of a piece of ground. Not knowing themselves as to whether they have authority to utilize this money already appropriated for the purpose of buying a piece of ground, they came before Congress with this bill; and we are giving them the authority.

The SPEAKER. If the money has already been appropriated for that purpose it does not require any more legislation.

Mr. EDMONDS. It has been appropriated for operating ships; and the question in their minds is whether they can use that money, appropriated for the operation of ships, for the purchase or permanent acquisition of a piece of ground.

The SPEAKER. If it is already appropriated for the purchase of this ground, then this is unnecessary; and if it has not been appropriated, then why is not this an appropriation?

Mr. DOWELL. A reappropriation.

Mr. EDMONDS. There seems to be confusion in the minds of the Shipping Board as to whether they have the power to authorize the use of the money for the purchase of ground.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair at first blush that we are facing this alternative: The gentleman says there is confusion. If the money has already been appropriated, this legislation is not necessary. If it has not been appropriated, why is not this an appropriation, and therefore against the rule? The Chair does not know whether it has been appropriated or not. The gentleman seems to think nobody knows.

Mr. EDMONDS. To my mind, the establishment of fuel stations around the world is a necessary part of the operation of a ship.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the Chair hear me a moment?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. EDMONDS. I agree with the Chair, but the Treasury Department do not agree with the Chair. They think it is necessary to have some further authorization.

Mr. MADDEN. The Shipping Board have a fuel station there now, and all they want to do is to buy the station which they already have.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is true.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no money authorized by that law. They have been before our committee trying to get authority to buy the land, and we would not give it to them.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois mean that his committee would not give it to them because they had no right to it?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and, besides that, we did not think they ought to buy this land. They have land there now.

The SPEAKER. Unless some one desires to argue the question further, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. One inquiry, Mr. Speaker. My impression is that the rule to which reference is now made applies as well to Senate bills which have been reported by a House committee as to House bills.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If that is so, I have no suggestion to make.

Mr. KNUTSON. As I understand it, the money has already been appropriated, a lump sum, for the operation of the Shipping Board.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; but not to buy land with.

Mr. KNUTSON. This would be an authorization to the Shipping Board to purchase land which they have leased.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would be an appropriation.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Has the Chair ruled?

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

ABOLITION OF CERTAIN OFFICES—STEAMBOAT INSPECTION SERVICE.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 12368) to abolish the inspection districts of Apalachicola, Fla., and Burlington, Vt., and the office of one supervising inspector, Steamboat Inspection Service.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls up the bill H. R. 12368. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. I do not think it will provoke any debate whatever.

Mr. BLANTON. There will be some debate upon it. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] will resume the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12368, with Mr. STAFFORD in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill may be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he desires to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM].

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the title of this bill explains its purpose. It is a bill to abolish the inspection districts of Apalachicola, Fla., and Burlington, Vt., and the office of one supervising inspector in the Steamboat Inspection Service. I dare say that it is rather unusual for the House to be requested to pass a bill abolishing offices and officers, but that is actually what is occurring in this instance, and the committee has reported the bill upon the recommendation of the Secretary of Commerce as well as of the President of the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If that is all there is to the bill there would be no objection from anyone, but by reason of the various paragraphs of the bill I for one want to be sure that that is all there is to it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will say to the gentleman that this bill is an exact reproduction of the present law, with the changes which I have stated, that these two inspection districts are omitted and this one supervising inspector is dropped from the present law.

Mr. BLANTON. These provisions here, that in a number of collection districts named, covering part of page 2 and most of page 3, there shall be one inspector of hulls and one inspector of boilers, are all in the present law.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is correct. There is no change in existing law at all, except as I have stated.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield for a moment, it will be necessary for me to retire from the Chamber before we dispose of this bill, in all probability. Speaking for the minority, I would say that this is a unanimous report from the committee. I took the matter up, as far as Apalachicola was concerned, with the Representative of that district, Mr. SMITHWICK, who informed me that he had made careful investigation of the facts and that the bill ought to be passed, as far as that district is concerned. Of course, I can not speak for the Vermont office. It seems to be a matter of economy, and I hope there will be no trouble about passing the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. On page 4 of the bill, in lines 6 and 7, there is a provision that each local inspector shall receive $2,100 a year. Is that any change from the present law?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is the present law.

Mr. BLANTON. There is no change in the matter of salary?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. None whatever.

Mr. BLANTON. Then the only change in the present law in this entire bill is the abolishing of these two districts mentioned and of one supervising inspector.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Those are the only changes. We thought it better to reenact the present law than merely to strike out certain words of it.

Mr. BLANTON. So far as I am concerned, the chairman may move to rise at any time.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I want to make this further statement: The enactment of this legislation will bring about a saving of $4,200 per year for the salaries of two local inspectors and $3,450 per year for the salary of one supervising inspector, besides the incidental expenses of maintaining the offices of the two collection districts. The Department of Commerce and the Steamboat Inspection Service have advised the committee that these offices and officers can be abolished without impairment of the service.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I do.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Burlington, Vt., happens to be in my district, or I happen to be representing the district in which Burlington, Vt., is situated—perhaps that is a better way to put it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Perhaps the committee should apologize for not conferring with the gentleman, but we understood there was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman be kind enough to have the RECORD show in his remarks somewhere some reference to the reason why the activity at Burlington should cease? It might satisfy some people not presently informed about it, because up to within a very short time they were more or less active there, as I understand it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I read from a letter dated August 29, 1922, addressed to myself, from Mr. D. N. Hoover, deputy supervising inspector general, Steamboat Inspection Service, on page 2 of the report of the committee, as follows:

In the Burlington, Vt., district there were inspected only 20 vessels, with a total gross tonnage of 3,825, and there were licensed only 27 men, of whom only 11 were examined, 16 being operators of motor vessels not requiring examination.

Then the letter goes on to say:

In the case of both of these districts it may be stated, first, with reference to Apalachicola, Fla., that no hardship was worked to the incumbents of the positions as local inspectors, because one was placed as an assistant inspector of hulls at Galveston, Tex., and the other was placed as an assistant inspector of boilers at Mobile, Ala.; and in the case of the Burlington office, the positions there were entirely vacant, the position of local inspector of boilers being made vacant by the retirement of Mr. Andrew I. Goodhue, and the position of local inspector of hulls being made vacant by the death of Capt. Charles A. Potter, so that no personal hardship was worked in either instance.

No "deserving" gentlemen, whether such personally, politically, or officially, have lost their positions.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. May I suggest to the gentleman, that as a further confirmation of his always intelligent remarks on subjects like this, the fact is that this gentleman, Mr. Goodhue, consenting by his resignation to this economy of Government, is the father-in-law of the Vice President of the United States. [Applause.] The administration is behind this in more ways than one.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Here is a letter, set out in the report, from the President, dated Washington, August 8, 1922, and addressed to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE]:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, August 8, 1922.

Hon. WILLIAM S. GREENE,
Chairman Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN GREENE: I am inclosing herewith a bill submitted to me by the Department of Commerce, with the recommendation of that department that it be enacted by the Congress. The bill abolishes two steamboat-inspection offices, one at Apalachicola, Fla., and the other at Burlington, Vt., and abolishes the office of one supervising inspector located under the existing statutes at Pittsburgh. This office, however, is now vacant, and there are no incumbents in any of the offices which it is proposed to abolish. I am very glad to recommend the enactment to the favorable consideration of Congress. It is quite in line with abolishing needless offices and confirming the program of economy.

Very truly yours,

WARREN G. HARDING.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will.

Mr. SEARS. Was a similar letter written to my colleague from Florida; I do not see it in the report.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I do not know; maybe it was. Mr. BANKHEAD, of Alabama, stated a little while ago that he conferred with Mr. SMITHWICK, who was familiar with this bill and was agreeable to the passage of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. No gentleman desiring recognition, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4404 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act of Congress approved July 2, 1918, be, and is hereby, amended by striking out the word "eleven" in the first line of the section and substituting therefor the word "ten," so that the section as amended shall read as follows:

"Sec. 4404. There shall be 10 supervising inspectors, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Each of them shall be selected for his knowledge, skill, and practical experience in the uses of steam for navigation, and shall be a competent judge of the character and qualities of steam vessels and of all parts of the machinery employed in steaming. Each supervising inspector shall be entitled to a salary of $3,450 a year, and his actual necessary traveling expenses while traveling on official business assigned him by competent authority, together with his actual and reasonable expenses for transportation of instruments, which shall be certified and sworn to under such instructions as shall be given by the Secretary of Commerce."

Sec. 2. That the first paragraph of section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act of Congress approved July 2, 1918, be, and is hereby, amended by striking out the words "Apalachicola, Fla.," and "and Burlington, Vt.," and by inserting the word "and" immediately before the words "Point Pleasant," so that the said paragraph as amended shall read as follows:

"Sec. 4414. There shall be in each of the following collection districts, namely, the districts of Philadelphia, Pa.; San Francisco, Calif.; New London, Conn.; Baltimore, Md.; Detroit, Mich.; Chicago, Ill.; Bangor, Me.; New Haven, Conn.; Michigan, Mich.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Willamette, Oreg.; Puget Sound, Wash.; Savannah, Ga.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Oswego, N. Y.; Charleston, S. C.; Duluth, Minn.; Superior, Mich.; Galveston, Tex.; Mobile, Ala.; Providence, R. I.; and in each of the following ports: New York, N. Y.; Jacksonville, Fla.; Tampa, Fla.; Portland, Me.; Boston, Mass.; Buffalo, N. Y.; Cleveland, Ohio; Toledo, Ohio; Norfolk, Va.; Evansville, Ind.; Dubuque, Iowa; Louisville, Ky.; Albany, N. Y.; Cincinnati, Ohio; Memphis, Tenn.; Nashville, Tenn.; St. Louis, Mo.; Port Huron, Mich.; New Orleans, La.; Los Angeles, Calif.; Juneau, Alaska; St. Michael, Alaska; and Point Pleasant, W. Va.; Honolulu, Hawaii; and San Juan, P. R.; one inspector of hulls and one inspector of boilers."

Sec. 3. That the seventh paragraph of section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act of Congress approved July 2, 1918, be, and is hereby, amended by striking out the words "and Apalachicola, Fla.," and "Burlington, Vt.," and by inserting the word "and" immediately before the word "Bangor," so that the said paragraph as amended shall read as follows:

"For the districts of Pittsburgh, Pa.; New Haven, Conn.; Savannah, Ga.; Charleston, S. C.; Galveston, Tex.; New London, Conn.; Superior, Mich.; and Bangor, Me.; and the ports of Dubuque, Iowa; Toledo, Ohio; Evansville, Ind.; Memphis, Tenn.; Nashville, Tenn.; Point Pleasant, W. Va.; Jacksonville, Fla.; Tampa, Fla.; Louisville, Ky.; and Cincinnati, Ohio; at the rate of $2,100 per year for each local inspector."

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STAFFORD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 12368 had directed him to report the same back without amendment, with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, the Committee on Enrolled Bills reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 6294. An act promoting civilization and self-support among the Indians of the Mescalero Reservation in New Mexico.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolutions and bill of the following titles:

S. J. Res. 79. Joint resolution authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 5,000 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic;

S. J. Res. 12. Joint resolution authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 13,902 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic; and

S. 472. An act for the relief of William B. Lancaster.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. Box was granted leave of absence for three days, on account of personal illness.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER. Has the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries any further business?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Thursday, February 1, 1923, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 1, 1923.

(Legislative day of Monday, January 29, 1923.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

THE WASHINGTON RAILWAY & ELECTRIC CO.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], in discussing an amendment to the District of Columbia appropriation bill a few days ago, made some statements relative to the Washington Railway & Electric Co. and their fares. I have a communication from the president of the company which I ask may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the communication.

The communication was read as follows:

WASHINGTON RAILWAY & ELECTRIC CO.,
Washington, D. C., January 29, 1923.

Hon. L. HEISLER BALL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: With reference to the discussions that have recently taken place on the floor of the Senate with regard to 5-cent car fare and tickets at the rate of six for 25 cents, I thought you might be interested to know that our expenses within the District of Columbia, without any interest charges or return upon investment, amounted during the year 1922 to 6.26 cents per pay passenger, divided as follows:

	Cents.
Maintenance way and structures	1.35
Maintenance equipment	.73
Power	.57
Conducting transportation	2.33
General and miscellaneous	.78
Taxes	.47
Miscellaneous items	.03
Total	6.26

With an 8-cent fare and tickets at the rate of six for 40 cents, the average fare per pay passenger is slightly less than 7 cents, leaving, as you see, a very small margin for return upon investment, and, of course, establishing beyond peradventure that any reduction in fare under existing conditions is out of the question, much less a return to the pre-war rates of fare. Wages, coal, and substantially all materials and supplies cost us about 100 per cent more than before the war.

Noting that the Senators from Tennessee and Alabama have been outspoken in their criticism of existing conditions, you might be interested to know that in the four largest cities in Tennessee and the two largest in Alabama the fares are as follows:

TENNESSEE.

Nashville: Fare, 7 cents straight; wages, 38 cents to 48 cents per hour.

Memphis: Fare, 7 cents straight; wages, 38 to 48 cents per hour.

Chattanooga: Fare, 7 cents straight; wages, 41 cents to 46 cents per hour.

Knoxville: Fare, 6 cents straight; wages 41 to 47 cents per hour.

WASHINGTON.

Fare, 8 cents straight, six tokens for 40 cents; wages, 51 cents to 61 cents per hour.

ALABAMA.

Birmingham: Fare, 8 cents cash, 15 tickets $1, transfer charge 2 cents; wages, 40 cents to 50 cents per hour.

Mobile: Fare, 8 cents cash, ticket rate 7 cents, transfer charge 1 cent; wages, 39 cents to 46 cents per hour.

All of the above cities have overhead trolley construction, whereas we have underground construction, which, as you know, costs two or three times as much to construct and maintain, and besides have a wage scale for trainmen from 51 cents to 56 cents per hour.

I am also taking the liberty of forwarding you a copy of our report to stockholders for the year 1922.

Would like to ask if you think any other Senators would be interested in receiving the above information or report?

Sincerely yours,

W. F. HAM, President.

DEPARTMENTAL USE OF AUTOMOBILES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in response to Senate Resolution 399, agreed to January 6, 1923, reporting relative to the number and cost of maintenance of passenger-carrying automobiles in use by the Navy Department and the Marine Corps, which was ordered to lie on the table.

WASHINGTON GAS LIGHT CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the vice president of the Washington Gas Light Co., transmitting, pursuant to law, a detailed statement of the business of the company for the year ended December 31, 1922, together with a list of its stockholders, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

POTOMAC ELECTRIC POWER CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the president of the Potomac Electric Power Co., transmitting, pursuant to law, the report of the company for the year ended December 31, 1922, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

WASHINGTON RAILWAY & ELECTRIC CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the president of the Washington Railway & Electric Co., transmitting, pursuant to law, the report of the company for the year ended December 31, 1922, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

WASHINGTON INTERURBAN RAILROAD CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the president of the Washington Interurban Railroad Co., transmitting, pursuant to law, the report of the company for the year ended December 31, 1922, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

CITY & SUBURBAN RAILWAY OF WASHINGTON.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the president of the City & Suburban Railway of Washington, transmitting, pursuant to law, the report of the company for the year ended December 31, 1922, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

GEORGETOWN & TENNALLYTOWN RAILWAY CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the president of the Georgetown & Tennallytown Railway Co., transmitting, pursuant to law, the report of the company for the year ended December 31, 1922, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

WASHINGTON & OLD DOMINION RAILWAY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the president of the Washington & Old Dominion Railway, stating that the annual report, as required by law, of the railway for the year 1922 is delayed owing to the illness of the treasurer, but that it will be submitted at the earliest possible moment, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PETITIONS.

Mr. ROBINSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Scranton, Coal Hill, and Hartman, all in the State of Arkansas, praying for the passage of legislation extending immediate aid to the famine-stricken peoples of the German and Austrian Republics, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. NELSON presented a resolution of the Parent-Teacher Association of the school of East Lake, Ga., favoring an amendment to the Constitution regulating child labor, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ELEPHANT BUTTE IRRIGATION DISTRICT.

Mr. McNARY, from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, to which was referred the bill (S. 4232) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to enter into a contract with the Elephant Butte irrigation district of New Mexico and the El Paso County improvement district No. 1 of Texas for the carrying out of the provisions of the convention between the United States and Mexico, proclaimed January 16, 1907, and providing compensation therefor, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1080) thereon.

ACCOUNTS OF ARMY DISBURSING OFFICERS.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The bill (H. R. 11528) to allow credits in the accounts of certain disbursing officers of the Army of the United States has been referred to the Committee on Miltary Affairs. I think the unbroken custom of the Senate has been that a bill of this character should be referred to the Committee on Claims. I therefore, out of order, ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROOKHART in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS PRESENTED.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on January 31, 1923, they presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions:

AMENDMENTS TO WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STERLING submitted an amendment proposing to strike from the bill the additional proviso that hereafter civilians employed in the hostess and library services and paid from the appropriation for military post exchanges may be appointed by the Secretary of War without reference to civil-service rules and regulations, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 13793, the War Department appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. SPENCER submitted an amendment providing that hereafter the Engineer officer in charge of public buildings and grounds shall, during the term of his office, have the rank, pay, and allowance of a brigadier general, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 13793, the War Department appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

RATES OF TAXATION ON EARNED AND UNEARNED INCOME.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, when the revenue bill was before the Senate I offered an amendment providing a difference in the rate of taxation on earned and unearned incomes. A man who labors to earn an income which barely supports his family should not be taxed as much as one whose income is from bonds and rents and who does not have to labor. I desire to place in the RECORD at this time a letter from the committee of manufacturers and merchants on Federal taxation in regard to the matter.

I want to quote Theodore Roosevelt, who, in the Century Magazine of October, 1913, said:

We believe in a heavily graded income tax that discriminates sharply in favor of the earned as compared with the unearned incomes.

William G. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury at the time the income tax law was put into force, said:

The time has arrived when earned incomes should be distinguished from the unearned and taxed at a lower rate.

I realize we can do nothing about the matter at this session, but at the next session of Congress I shall offer some measure of relief in the hope that something may be done.

I ask that the letter to which I have referred may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMITTEE OF MANUFACTURERS AND

QUESTION: SHOULD EARNED INCOMES BE TAXED AT THE SAME RATE AS UNEARNED INCOMES?

DEAR SENATOR HARRIS: This organization believes that the time has come when, in addition to the graduated feature of our present income tax, a distinction must be made between incomes that are earned and incomes that are unearned, and the earned incomes taxed at a lower rate than the unearned.

We believe that unless this is done the whole industrial organism will eventually go on the rocks.

It is now clear that our present income tax, which makes no distinction between the two kinds of incomes, but which taxes both earned and unearned at the same rate, produces three very grave results:

- (1) It penalizes the "producers" and rewards the "nonproducers."
- (2) It subtracts from the purchasing power of the large majority, decreases the market and cripples business and industry.
- (3) It tends to concentrate wealth instead of distributing it.

That the income tax law as it now stands penalizes the "producers" and rewards the "nonproducers" is clear, because it taxes the earnings of the farmer, the earnings of the laborer, the earnings of the merchant, manufacturer, lumberman, mine operator, and professional man—in short, the earnings of all "workers," dollar for dollar, as heavily as it taxes the incomes of those who render no service in return—such as the receivers of our ever-increasing rents of ground, annuities, royalties of natural resources, and interest on stocks and bonds based upon the rich gifts of nature.

That our present income tax also cripples business and industry is evident, because, falling heavily as it does upon all laboring, agricultural, commercial, industrial, and professional classes, it cuts down the purchasing power of the vast majority of our consumers and thereby diminishes the market for all goods produced.

Finally, that our present income tax tends to concentrate wealth instead of distributing it is true, because its effect is to impoverish those who are already poor and to enrich still more those who are already rich.

Earned incomes are not the basis of "big fortunes"; the unearned incomes are. By overtaxing our farming, lumbering, mining, merchandizing, manufacturing, and professional classes, therefore, the present law tends to discourage production and to cut down still further the already insufficient incomes of these various classes.

On the other hand, by undertaxing the beneficiaries of monopoly and special privilege—the receivers of ground rents, royalties, and interest on stocks and bonds based upon the free gifts of nature, the present law tends to foster monopoly, stimulate the spread of vast estates, and add still more to the overgrown fortunes of a favored few.

We repeat, therefore, the time has come when, in our opinion, the present income tax law should be so amended as to distinguish between incomes that are earned and incomes that are unearned, and the earned incomes taxed at a very substantially lower rate than the unearned.

We believe that this is not only desirable but absolutely necessary if social and economic prosperity is to continue.

We believe that such an amendment will furnish both directly and indirectly an immense relief to the now overburdened agricultural, laboring, business, and professional classes of the Nation, and, moreover, that it will meet with the overwhelming approval of the American electorate.

Will you be so kind as to let us hear from you on the attached sheet whether or not you are in harmony with the idea expressed above? Self-addressed and stamped envelope is inclosed for your convenience.

Very cordially yours,

COMMITTEE OF MANUFACTURERS AND MERCHANTS ON FEDERAL TAXATION (INC.).
OTTO CULLMAN, Chairman.

Theodore Roosevelt says (Century Magazine, October, 1913): "We believe in a heavily graded income tax that discriminates sharply in favor of the earned as compared with the unearned incomes."

William G. McAdoo says (speech at Newton, Kans., 1921): "The time has arrived when earned incomes should be distinguished from the unearned and taxed at a lower rate."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhulse, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4390) to amend the last paragraph of section 10 of the Federal reserve act, as amended by the act of June 3, 1922, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed bills of the following titles, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 12368. An act to abolish the inspection districts of Apalachicola, Fla., and Burlington, Vt., and the office of one supervising inspector, Steamboat Inspection Service; and

H. R. 13773. An act to amend an act to regulate radio communication, approved August 13, 1912, and for other purposes.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 12368) to abolish the inspection districts of Apalachicola, Fla., and Burlington, Vt., and the office of one supervising inspector, Steamboat Inspection Service, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RURAL-CREDIT FACILITIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States, to amend the Federal farm loan act, to amend the Federal reserve act, and for other purposes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I shall vote for this bill, because I believe that in some sections of the country by giving to agricultural paper a greater degree of liquidity it will assist some few would-be borrowers.

But I do not want my vote to be taken as an indication that I have any confidence that the bill will materially help those agricultural sections that most badly need help. And who are they who need the assisting arm of the Government to-day? The cotton grower is receiving a price for his cotton very much above the pre-war value. The corn raiser is receiving a good price for his corn. No one can complain of the price received for wool, sheep, cattle, or hogs. The main trouble that is besetting these classes which I have mentioned to-day is the heavy increase in the cost of labor in production and the still greater increase in the cost of the land on which the crops are produced and the cattle fed. The greatest sufferers, however, of the agricultural class are those whose location or situation compels them to continue the raising of wheat, oats, barley, rye, and similar small grains. The prices received by the producers of these crops are less than pre-war prices, while the cost of production and transportation has more than doubled, and the taxes levied upon producing lands have trebled.

Under the impetus of war values for farm products the prices of all lands soared to the skies. Farms were sold and resold at inflated values and mortgages given for the purchase price. To-day the product, after paying the cost of producing, will not pay the interest on the investment. The farmer cries out against this. We answer, "We will make it easier for you to borrow money." He replies, "What is the use of my borrowing when my crop will not pay the interest on what I now owe?" That is the real situation in my State, and I think generally in the Northwest. That is also true in many other sections of the country. There is money enough in my State to-day to take care of all the borrowing demand provided the farmers can give safe security.

I have here a statement of the condition of a small bank in that section of the country where there have been several crop failures. It is a small bank, and it is to the proportion of deposits carried to the amount of loans made that I especially call attention. I notice that the individual deposits are $133,749.43; time-certificate deposits are $70,295.92, making a total of $204,044.35.

Now, turning to the resource side of the ledger we find: Loans and discounts, $87,327; other stocks and bonds, $16,866.24, or a total investment of $104,193.66 in the shape of loans and stocks and bonds owned.

In other words, the loanable fund of the bank is just double what is actually loaned out. The balance lies idle. What is the cause of this? Banks would like to have every cent they have in deposits, within the line of reasonable safety, to be employed. It is not employed in this case because either there is no demand or else there is no safe farm paper that can be secured; and what I mean by "safe" is paper that will be paid when it becomes due.

That there is no safe farm paper can be shown from another statement which I received from the same section from a splendid farmer, a hard worker, honest and conscientious. He owns a half section of land, on which there is a mortgage of only $2,500. This statement shows, although he has not paid any interest on this mortgage since 1918, sometimes on account of failure of crop, that even this year with a full crop he is unable to pay any interest on his mortgage. This may be interesting to those who want to know the real condition of the farmer, for whom we are to legislate. He had to purchase seed for his crop, and the following are the main items of his expenses:

Seed rye	$100.00
Seed wheat	275.00
Interest on notes given therefor	25.00
Twine	60.00
Hauling grain	55.00
Binder extras	23.85
Threshing	397.88
Taxes	469.00
Total	1,405.73

He reserved for seed wheat 300 bushels; for seed rye 100 bushels. The balance of the wheat which he raised, 1,342 bushels, he sold for 82 cents per bushel, receiving $1,100.41. The balance of the rye, 1,012 bushels, he sold for 46 cents per bushel, receiving $465.62. The total received was $1,562.95. His principal items of expense totaled $1,405.73, which left a balance of $160.20.

Now, this balance must pay for the grocery bills, doctor bills, and clothing for quite a large family for a whole year, and yet he has not paid one penny on the interest on his mortgage indebtedness.

Now, when this good farmer shows such a condition when he raised a fair crop, is it any wonder that the banker must say to him: "I can't see how you can make ends meet." Is it any wonder that this farmer says: "I don't want to borrow any money; I have borrowed all I can afford to borrow. What I want is a price for my product that will enable me to pay these enormous expenses." This bill, Mr. President, will not help that farmer any; no other bill before the Congress is going to help him.

The other day, in a somewhat more lengthy address, I presented what I believe to be the farmer's remedy, and his only remedy. I diagnosed the cause of his trouble. The value of his products, although much increased in some lines above pre-war prices, when the value of his land is taken into consideration, the added taxes, and the enormous added cost of labor, is disjointed and not properly related in reference to the prices which he must pay for the commodities which he purchases.

Mr. President, on a building being erected in Philadelphia, which I think was finished a short time ago, I am informed that plasterers received $33 a day. Allowing 300 days for a working year, that would amount to $9,900 per year. While this, of course, is above the normal, nevertheless the wages range from $16 to $24 per day in our great cities for this kind of labor. Now, all kinds of business is done, not under the open sky, but in buildings. Products are manufactured in buildings. People must live in homes or in the stalls of apartment houses. On account of excessive prices of real estate in the cities, nearly all of these buildings are erected on foundations of gold. The public must pay the price in rentals. The clerk, the great mass of human beings in the country who must earn their daily bread, are being ground to death because of the combinations of labor on one hand and of capital on the other. Whenever we have had a great railway strike, the question has never presented itself, What ought the public to pay for freight, but how much can the public still stand and live? Wages have been increased and freights have been increased with no consideration except for the interests of the railroad operators on one hand and railway employees on the other. The public that must pay the freight have never been given a fair hearing. I recall that in the coal strike during President Roosevelt's administration the striking miners insisted that there was nothing whatever to prevent the operators from paying the additional demand of the strikers. They stated that a mere additional charge of 50 cents per ton would fully compensate the operators for the added cost of production. The coal strike was settled along that basis. Many subsequent strikes have taken place and each time have been settled upon the same basis, until to-day we are paying $18 per ton for coal that is scarcely fit to burn in our furnaces.

Learned Senators tell us the remedy is a coalition between the farmer and the laborer. I can imagine the response the farmer would receive if the price of his product was raised to correspond with the added cost of our city labor.

Mr. President, there is just one remedy. The remedy is in the hands of the farmer, if he only knew how to organize and how to make use of it. He does not know how to go about doing it. The field seems too varied and too large for him. What he needs is some kind of a nation-wide law under which he can begin and consummate his organization. That nation-wide law should be a law providing for cooperative selling. Now, mere cooperative selling will not alone meet the farmer's requirements. Back of the power to cooperate in selling his products, back of the joint selling of his product, must be the power to cooperate in the joint holding of his product until he can get his own price for it. He must meet force with force. He must meet all of the combinations against his interest with a combination for his interest. He must say to the laborers who want his assistance, and whose compensation is from $8 to $30 a day, and which added compensation increases the cost of everything on earth he purchases, "You can not have a bushel of my wheat, a pound of my beef, a bale of my cotton, until you are willing to pay me a sum that will allow me a compensation that will equal your own, until I can live just as well as you live, until I can pay my debts and the interest on my mortgages."

Mr. President, I again call attention to the fact that there has been introduced such a bill for a comprehensive system of cooperative selling of all farm products, a bill that will allow the farmer to do just what all others have done—strike against the inequality, the wrong and injustice he has suffered, until that inequality has been righted. The remedy is in his own hands to a certain extent. We can assist him, however, in placing the remedy in his hands more effectively by enacting the right kind of a law. It is no answer to say that he can perfect that organization without any general law. He could have formed farmers' banks and rural-credits organizations without any general law, but he never formed them until we passed a law under which he could organize. He will never have a system of complete and satisfactory cooperative marketing and cooperative withholding of products from the market for a just and fair price until he has a general law under which he can operate. Congress can pass thousands of laws for rural credits, but they are not going to meet the situation—they will only scratch the surface.

The only other remedy that has been proposed here is that of the Government purchasing the farmer's products, but even that proposed remedy will fix no price for his commodities and will not overcome the law of supply and demand. In the end such a course would be far worse for the country as a whole than the disease from which we are now suffering. Cooperative selling and, above all, cooperative and combined withholding from the market alone can cure the evil from which agriculture is suffering.

That is the only plan which will equalize the great difference between the earning power, the wage power, the standard of living in the cities, and the low wage and the low standard of living in the rural districts.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat will he permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the Senator has stated quite fairly the situation of the farmer; but he leaves the intimation that the laboring man is getting about $9,900 a year, because some plasterer or persons engaged in other forms of labor receive $33 a day in Philadelphia. Is that a fair illustration of the condition of the laboring man at this time?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I said that it was not; but I stated that the cost of labor engaged in the construction of buildings is enormous as compared with other kinds of labor, and that these extremely high wages are responsible for high rents and high cost of production of the things which the farmer must purchase. In this city alone but a short time ago on a building being erected $24 a day was being paid to plasterers; in the city of New York the rate is over $16 a day; and in Chicago it is about the same. Those rates of wage are so disproportionate and increase the price of rents and everything that is produced and must be produced in those buildings to such an extent that it disjoins the proper relation between conditions in the country and those of the city.

Mr. BROOKHART. Has the Senator information as to how many days on an average a plasterer is able to work in the United States?

Mr. McCUMBER. In Washington, in this part of the country, he is able to work all the time. In the far northern States, in my section of the country, not very much plastering is done in the wintertime; but there are not any plasterers there. They are in the great cities, where they can receive these large, these excessive wages.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator has no accurate information as to what the actual average employment of plasterers is throughout the United States?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no accurate information as to what it is in some sections. I say in the city of Washington it lasts the year round. That is true probably in the city of New York, in the city of Philadelphia, and in most of the States until you get into Minnesota and probably northern New York and the smaller States of the Union, where, instead of remaining in the wintertime, perhaps, many of them go to the larger cities.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; but I have been in Washington when the plasterers were all idle, too. Now, let me submit this proposition: We have just developed in the Standard Oil hearings that the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, which had the biggest profits and the biggest stock dividends and everything else, paid its 13,000 employees who got less than $5,000 a year an average of $1,080 a year. Would the Senator consider that an excessive wage to be paid to those men?

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President; on the contrary, I am not discussing that class at all. I am discussing those that are connected with the building trades, whose high wages increase the cost of production of everything that is done inside of those buildings, and increase rents. Does not the Senator understand that when, in building a hotel here, $24 a day is paid for a plasterer, the guests of that hotel will have to pay the bill? The Senator understands that there are thousands of workers, thousands of girls and young men here in the city who are not receiving proper nourishment because they must pay out most of their salary for a little room in which they can shelter themselves from the cold. The wrong is against those breadwinners and every one of these people that the Senator is talking about. There is an improper correlation between the several classes of labor in the United States, whereby the great mass of the people are being held by the throat as between—and I stated this before—the combination of capital on the one side, and the combination of the building trades on the other side.

Mr. BROOKHART. I observed that the Senator included capital in that combination. I was glad to note that; but the Senator gave no instances to illustrate how much capital was taking as compared to labor.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have given those instances a great many times, and I have mentioned a great many times the fact that the farmer is suffering from a combination which has gradually increased the cost of producing everything that the farmer must purchase, while as a rule he is getting no additional price for the thing which they produce.

Mr. BROOKHART. To me, the unfair part of the Senator's proposition is that he does not deal in the averages of what labor is getting. On the whole, if he will look it up, I think in hardly any line, outside at least of the building line, would he even criticize the wages paid.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; on the contrary, I say that there is a great middle class—and I stated that to-day—of breadwinners, including other classes of laborers, and the American people are all breadwinners, who suffer from the excessive cost of buildings and consequent costs of houses and rentals. Many are merely clerks who are not receiving even the wage the Senator mentions. They are laboring in and they have to live in the cities. They have to pay these big rents, and it is an awful imposition upon them. They are obliged to a great extent to live on canned goods, which they must purchase to save the expense of going to a restaurant and paying for meals there. It is an imposition upon them. What we most need in this country is a readjustment of wages and profits of all kinds to the end that every class, including our farmers, may have a just remuneration for his toll. At the present time the farmer is the great sufferer in this maladjustment of earnings, brought about by combinations which year after year has widened the breach between rural and urban populations, and, as I see it, the only remedy for the farmer is to meet combinations with countercombinations.

Mr. BROOKHART. The farmer does not stop at these high-priced hotels or these high-priced buildings.

Mr. McCUMBER. No, indeed; he does not.

Mr. BROOKHART. He stays away from them.

Mr. McCUMBER. Indeed, he does. He does not stop at them; but indirectly he suffers because of those high prices, because, in the general balancing of the scale, all of them must be paid by some one, and the burden always seems to be loaded upon the agricultural section of the country.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator mentioned the coal business; but the coal miners on an average do not get as much wages in a year as do the Standard Oil employees, and they have to live the year around.

Mr. McCUMBER. The earnings of the coal miners who have been striking, and who are laboring only three or four or five days out of a week, naturally are not as great as they would be if they were laboring for such a price that all the important mines could be opened up and produce and sell coal so that the rest of us could purchase it at a living price.

Mr. BROOKHART. But the plan of the operators is to keep enough miners on hand so that when the peak of the business comes they can fill the cars without storing or anything of that kind. The result is that during three or four months of the year they have employment for labor, and the rest of the time they get only two or three days' work a week, and the operators will only allow them two or three days' work.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the reason why I have stated that the interest of the public has always been lost sight of. The question determined in each settlement is, How much can the operators make and how much can they pay employees and still maintain their profits? And so the public pays the bill, whatever it is. That seems to be the situation.

Mr. BROOKHART. One more proposition and I will desist. The joint commission of Congress found that the farmer gets only 37 cents out of the dollar that the laboring man pays for his product, and the laboring men claim that they get only 35 cents out of the dollar which the farmer pays for the products of labor. If those things are true, does it not indicate that the distribution both ways is what is taxing both labor and the farmer in the United States?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is true. There is not any question about the faultiness of our distribution system; but if I take the average retailer in the cities, outside of a few great department stores, I can not find that he is making any great profit. If you will look at the rents he has to pay, you will find that they are enormous. Take a man dealing in meat products. He has a little corner where he has to turn over his capital about three times a month to pay the rent alone. That is the trouble; it is these high rents, this high cost of living in the cities, that has been so disproportionate as compared with what the farmer receives for his product.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; but does not this exorbitant cost of distribution increase the expenses of the laboring man, and make higher wages necessary for him to live at all?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly; and so when one class of people get $30 a day for erecting a house, it means that every other laborer who must either buy or rent that house has to pay that extra rental, even though he may not receive for his labor a price that would justify such high rentals.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I shall be very brief.

I have read the measure before the Senate, which is to be voted upon to-morrow. I am sure it will be helpful to agriculture. I do not think it has gone as far as the Congress might have gone to meet the situation. Inasmuch as the farmers have insisted, year in and year out, that they were entitled to some financial redress of grievances and that their credit system was not adapted to their needs, I had thought that when Congress should finally recognize that they were correct in this contention it would try to give the farmers the system that they, the farmers themselves, believe would meet their situation, unless the Congress should decide first that the farmers seek an unfair advantage over other classes of American citizens or else that the farmer is so ignorant that he does not know what it is that he needs. I feel certain that one or the other of those theories actuated the framers of this measure—that they thought the farmer asked more than he was entitled to receive or else that he was too ignorant to know what his needs are and what the remedy for those needs is. It is to be regretted that the framers of this legislation had not more knowledge of the farmer's needs and more sympathy with his wishes.

There are good features about the bill. It does not go, I take it, as far as the Congress could have gone and been absolutely fair to other classes of American citizens. I believe that the Congress will go further in the years that are to come; and hoping, at least, that that will be true, I shall vote for the measure when the opportunity is presented. There are some provisions of the measure that I wish particularly to commend, and I shall discuss those first, and offer one or two amendments later.

In the first place, I think the Congress did wisely to recognize that personal credits were as essential to agricultural production as land credits, and therefore that it is important to give the farmer these credits without weighting them down with taxation; in other words, to give him a tax-exempt evidence of indebtedness, so that he might procure reasonably cheap money. I am tempted to discuss that feature of the matter, Mr. President, because in to-day's paper is a renewal of the attack by the Secretary of the Treasury on tax-exempt bonds. It seems to be the idea of the Secretary, and evidently the idea of the administration, as recorded in a proposed constitutional amendment which passed the House recently, that you can create wealth by taxation; that if any resources escape taxes it diminishes the wealth of the country by reason of the fact that it is tax exempt. The argument is put forth, Mr. President, that certain wealth is escaping taxation; that if you could tax the credit of the State, the credit of the county, the credit of the municipality, you would create wealth. As strange as that idea seems, Mr. President, I am convinced that the Secretary of the Treasury, great financier though he be, entertained that view: That if you could lay your hands upon the credits of the States, counties, and municipalities, and all their activities, you could create wealth. The impression seems to exist that if a thing is taxed, if you can collect money from the people under a taxing scheme, the whole people are that much richer.

The proposed amendment to the Constitution, which, of course, has nothing to do with this measure except incidentally as it affects tax-exempt securities, was presented upon the theory that if you would permit the Federal Government to tax the credit of the State through all its various organizations, and in return give the State the right to tax securities of the United States, the people would be richer, when, as a matter of fact, everyone knows, and the Secretary of the Treasury ought to know as well as anyone else, that the Government has not a dollar of its own; that whatever it has within its keeping is what it has taken from somebody else; that it never created a dollar and can not create one; that wealth must be created by the brawn and sweat of individuals. Whatever the Government may have it must take from the people, and they have correspondingly less.

Strange to say, intelligent people, patriotic people, have been misled by this propaganda that has swept over the country that wealth is escaping taxation by reason of tax-exempt securities. Wealth does not escape taxation in that way. It finds much more profitable means of tax dodging. It is so elementary that anyone ought to be able to see that granting the State the right to tax Federal bonds would not produce any benefit to the State, because the very people who tax the Federal bonds must be taxed to raise the money to pay the increased interest which the Federal bonds draw. In other words, it is a taxation of one by himself for the benefit of himself, when all of us know that it costs considerable money to levy and collect a tax. Therefore, the man who enjoys this advantage which the Secretary this morning so insists on must tax himself for the privilege. He does not create a dollar. He can not be the richer by reason of the privilege, but must be the poorer by reason of the cost of assessing and collecting and distributing.

That feature of the bill which allows these banks to issue tax-exempt securities I heartily indorse. It would be a travesty not to have included that provision. I want to answer an insinuation which arose from a question asked by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] yesterday, when he wanted to know, in effect, what the farm bloc was and who were the members of the farm bloc and, incidentally, what a farmer is, for I think that was the question in the back of his mind. He was afraid some kind of legislation was about to slip through the Senate that would be of advantage to the farmer, when the "steel" producers in Pennsylvania, however you may spell the word, did not share the larger returns.

To start with, these "farmers" who live in the cities might as well recognize now, as well as any other time, that eventually the farmer must sell his products for enough to meet the cost of production. They might as well know that the cost of production is enhanced by the rate of interest the farmer must pay for the credit he must have to enable him to produce. Therefore, whenever the farmer is finally compensated for the thing he produces, the cost of his credit must be added, and since everybody must eat, however his profits may be derived from some other occupation, everybody is concerned in the cost of production of the things we eat. Wherever, therefore, you cheapen the cost of production of farm products, it eventually will be reflected in the cheaper cost of living to all other classes of people. They thus obtain equal benefits with the farmer, because the benefit is distributed throughout the entire population through the diminishing of the cost of production of that thing which everybody must consume. Therefore, those Senators who feel so apprehensive that steel and railroads and special interests may be discriminated against by reason of some kind of legislation for the farmers may take heart and remember that if the farmers produce at less cost they will eat at less cost.

I want to suggest an amendment, and I shall later offer it. On page 6 of the measure, in the first paragraph, which commences on page 5, there is a provision that notes given for agricultural purposes are not subject to rediscount if the rate of interest is in excess of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I suggest that there should be an amendment at that point providing that if a bonus or anything of value is given to procure the loan the paper shall not be subject to rediscount. It sometimes happens, where rates of interest are fixed, to require the borrower to pay a bonus in order to procure the loan. I imagine all of us are acquainted with the practice. I know I have, and very recently. Therefore, in order to make the bill do what the proponents of it wish, I should like to make it read that the paper shall not be subject to rediscount if the rate of interest is in excess of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the prevailing rate of discount on commercial paper or if the banks have required a bonus from the borrower. Otherwise the provision of itself is without any effect.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I quite appreciate the point the Senator makes. I want to call his attention, however, to the difficulty in the administration of the bill in the form in which he presents it. It would prohibit any land bank from making any discount if there be any bonus or commission; but how is that to be determined? Those things are always secret, as the Senator knows.

Mr. CARAWAY. I concede the difficulty. In many cases it might be impossible ever to ascertain that fact.

Mr. LENROOT. The point is that, it being impossible to ascertain it, in order to be sure that they would not violate the law the banks would refuse to discount in many cases where they wanted to. I want to make this suggestion to the Senator, which occurred to me yesterday in thinking this over, that it would be feasible, I think, to require that no discount should be made unless there should be an affidavit accompanying the application.

Mr. CARAWAY. I should not object to that.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator will prepare his amendment in that form, I shall have no criticism of it; but I think the Senator sees the point.

Mr. CARAWAY. I see the Senator's position. I was not aware that the Senator was in the Chamber, and I wish to call his attention to another provision which I should like to have him consider.

Mr. SMITH. Before the Senator calls attention to that; he spoke a moment ago of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. He means $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent in excess of the rate fixed.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes. I realize that my statement was rather a loose way of expressing the idea I had in mind.

Mr. SMITH. Those who were trying to follow the Senator might get the impression—

Mr. CARAWAY. That the rate of interest was $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to a provision on page 7, in the second paragraph, where it reads:

If at any time the capital stock provided for in the first paragraph of this section shall be found by the Federal Farm Loan Board to be insufficient to enable any farm credits department in a Federal land bank to meet the credit needs of the agricultural and livestock industries in its district, intended to be served by the facilities provided under Title II of this act, such capital shall, upon application of the Federal Farm Loan Board, if approved by the President of the United States, be increased by an amount not to exceed $5,000,000.

The thing I had in mind was this, that under the provisions of the bill it seems that you must take into consideration the whole system—the 12 regional banks. It might be that in New England, we will say, there is not much demand for these farm credits, while in Wisconsin or Minnesota or down in my section of the country there might be great demand. That being true as between the two, there might be no demand for an increase of capital. What I would like to see, if possible, is the insertion of a provision to enable the President to increase the capital stock of the bank in the particular region where it might be required, without being required to increase the capital stock of a regional bank where there was no demand for an increase of credits.

Mr. LENROOT. Is not that what the bill does now?

Mr. CARAWAY. I am a little bit doubtful about it.

Mr. LENROOT. That is certainly the intention. If there is any question about it, I should be very glad to have it cleared up.

Mr. CARAWAY. The intention was to make that possible?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am glad to know that. I thought there was some doubt about it.

Mr. LENROOT. That is the intention. There may be one district where $5,000,000 is ample, and another district where it is not, and it may be increased in the one district.

Mr. CARAWAY. Without the President being compelled to increase in the other. That was the idea I had in mind.

Mr. LENROOT. It is clear, I think.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought the language was not clear on that point. These are the only amendments I intended to suggest.

I shall now discuss briefly the amendment suggested on yesterday by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] with reference to increasing the length of time commodity paper might be rediscounted in the Federal reserve system. The law now provides that it may be rediscounted up to six months. The amendment, as it appears in the bill, purposes to make it nine months. The amendment suggested by the Senator from South Carolina was to change it from 9 months to 12 months. I wanted, by a simple statement, to support the suggested amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

I am not as familiar with the growing of grain and the livestock industry as most Senators who had to do with the framing of this measure, I dare say. I am very familiar, in a modest way, with the production of cotton and its marketing. To give us a nine months' credit is to deny us credit altogether. It does not do one much good to have a credit extended to him to produce something and have it withdrawn before he can market it. In other words, it frequently happens that it is an invitation to ruin. If you give a man credit to produce an article and demand payment of the obligation before he may market that product in an orderly way, you invite his destruction.

It can not hurt anyone; it will help many; and therefore I hope the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina increasing the time from 9 months to 12 months will be adopted.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I present two amendments to the pending measure, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, referring to the bill under consideration and to some of the suggested amendments, I desire to submit a few observations. I shall begin with reference to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART].

His amendment involves a very considerable undertaking. He offers an amendment which means the establishment of a system of cooperative banks. Now, I have always been a sincere friend of the cooperative idea. I believe in it fully, especially with reference to marketing and, so far as possible, cooperation in the matter of acquiring supplies, and purposes of that kind; for instance, as cooperative societies for the purchase of fertilizer and machinery. But I have never had occasion to work out any plan in my own mind looking to a financial scheme based upon that principle.

My disposition is to be favorable to the idea, but I regret that the Senator from Iowa did not offer the matter before we reached this stage in the consideration of the bill. I wish it might have been feasible for him to have proposed it earlier in the session, so as to have it take its usual course by being referred either to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry or to the Committee on Banking and Currency or to some committee which would have given careful consideration to it, had hearings upon it, thoroughly investigated the whole subject, and had expert advice also as to the phraseology and the language to be employed to meet the views intended to be carried into execution by the proposed legislation.

Up to this time I have not had the opportunity to consider thoroughly all the details of the proposed amendment and to arrive at a conclusion as to whether it would be wise to support it as an amendment to the pending bill or not. As I said, my inclination would be to favor the idea, and if the matter assumed shape so that we could be fully confident that it would accomplish what the intention and purpose apparently is, I might support it. But we might make a very serious mistake.

The whole matter of banking is a delicate subject, as it is an important subject. It is rather technical in many of its details, especially when we attempt to express in statutory form the precise plan and system which we are endeavoring to put into effect. If we should undertake here to provide a scheme and a system that would prove to be unworkable, it would be a futile thing to do. If it should be workable and we found afterwards that it was not scientific and not economically sound in any respect, however much we might have endeavored to make it so, we would have committed an error and might thus do very great harm instead of good. I would be glad if we had a little more time and opportunity to consider thoroughly all the details of the proposal. I propose even yet to give further thought and study to it, so that when the time comes we may be able to vote more intelligently upon it.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President—

Mr. FLETCHER. As it is now, I feel that we would be rather voting in the dark on the question, because I confess I do not quite thoroughly understand it, and I have not had the opportunity yet, up to this time, to digest it and work it out in my own mind. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. I will state to the Senator from Florida that the amendment interferes with none of the provisions of the present banking laws. On the contrary, it is safeguarded by the national banking act, which would protect this kind of an organization. It involves no new idea whatever except the cooperative idea.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire of the Senator just how the cooperative idea is intended to be put into operation under his amendment?

Mr. BROOKHART. Under the national bank laws generally as they now exist, with the same supervision. All through the proposition it is to remain under the control of the national bank act. The national bank act is made applicable to this proposition.

Mr. LENROOT. What does the Senator from Iowa say about capitalization?

Mr. BROOKHART. The capitalization in the cooperative bank?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. BROOKHART. It often has no capital at all. The amendment which I have proposed provides for a capitalization with a minimum of $15,000.

Mr. LENROOT. That is contrary to the present banking law.

Mr. BROOKHART. It modifies it to that extent; but at every point where it is modified it is mentioned specifically in the amendment. The general law applies to it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I shall consider the matter further. I am not taking a position for or against it at present. I am simply referring in this general way to the subject, intending to convey the idea that it is a very important subject and one that is more or less technical and involves really what I would consider a very considerable task in framing precisely the language in order to establish a new plan of that sort, new in all important respects.

Now, with particular reference to the bill before us, I may be pardoned a personal allusion just to this extent. I do not claim to be a farmer. However, I grew up on a farm. I went through all the stages of farm work from the planting of the crops, harvesting the various crops, splitting rails, building fences, digging ditches, hauling, ginning, packing, and all the various activities with which the farmer has to do.

I was on a farm until I was 21 years of age, except the months I was at school. I began work on the farm when I was 6 years of age. I remember very distinctly the first work I undertook. In those days we had a man who would lay off a furrow for corn, and then we had a boy follow and drop the corn in the furrow. Then we had another man to cover it with a double-shovel plow, straddling the furrow behind the boy, covering the corn. As I said, beginning at that point I proceeded through all the toil and labor and struggle that the average farmer has to go through. Incidentally, I am satisfied this work, beginning as early as it did, never did me any harm. It may be this experience which preserves my calm and withholds my indignation when I hear repeated the alleged horrors of child labor. So I know something from actual experience about the farmer's difficulties, his tasks, and his returns. I know from actual observation respecting the neighbors and those engaged in agriculture in that portion of Georgia where I then lived. What I am saying is not based upon mere theory, but what the actual conditions were as I found them and as I went through them.

I said then in those days that if the time ever came when I could be of any service to the farmers of the country, it would afford me the highest gratification to be able to render that service. I feel as sincerely that way to-day as I did when I was actually engaged in that occupation. I have always felt that way; not that I am opposed to any measure which looks to the general welfare of the entire people of the whole country; not that I am disposed to confine my energies solely to benefiting the farmers of the country; not that I am centering upon one particular industry in the effort to do what I can to serve the interests of that industry as against any other; but because I feel and have always felt that agriculture lies at the very foundation of all our prosperity, and that in order to build wisely and well we should first build the foundation secure and lasting and upon that foundation construct whatever we feel ought to be constructed for the whole country; in other words, not to begin to build at the top, not to put up a superstructure by legislative enactment or otherwise that will be founded upon sand or upon insecure and unsubstantial ground-work, but, beginning with the foundation, to build upon that foundation and proceed with the other developments. I conceive that to legislate to properly serve and promote a healthy, sound agriculture, upon which all people must depend for their food and their clothes, is the wise course to pursue. For that reason our primary concern is with this basic industry.

I believe that we can not revive business until we first revive agriculture. Therefore, it is important, it seems to me, to look first to this foundation; not, as I have said, sacrificing other things at all. In all the work which I have had to do and in all my relations with the farm bloc, if you please, I and they have never insisted that other things must be neglected or that other subjects be put to one side or that other measures of general good to the whole country must not be considered, but, on the other hand, we have cheerfully assisted in everything that was considered to be wise and proper and helpful, at the same time keeping in view the importance of this great industry.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] on yesterday desired to know something about the membership of the farm bloc. I have not endeavored to keep in mind such details, but I find in the Congressional Digest of January, on page 112, a list of names which purports to be the membership of the farm bloc. Hence one reason for making the allusion I have as to my own experience is by way of showing, perhaps, some qualifications for membership in that cooperative effort on the part of certain Members of this body. However, I need not dwell upon that. Their work speaks for itself. Others have sought to claim credit for what that "bloc" accomplished in the last Congress in spite of their criticism and opposition.

Based upon my own observation and experience with reference to farming, I believe that one of the chief difficulties with which the farmer has to contend is that usually he is obliged in these days and has been all along to purchase the things he needs on time. That statement applies to the purchase of his supplies, beginning with his fertilizer and continuing clear through the year, even the supplies for his tenants and for all the labor. Everything that is needed on the farm, whether he actually works it himself or rents it out to others, to whom he must furnish the necessary supplies, including those essential to cultivating the farm and harvesting the crop and all that sort of thing, is ordinarily bought on time. That means he must pay for them 10, 15, and 25 per cent more than he would pay if he were able to buy them for cash. The problem then is to furnish facilities by which the farmer—and I am talking now particularly with reference to the small farmer—can have cash so that he may purchase on a cash basis what he needs throughout the year while cultivating and harvesting his crop and before putting it on the market, and thus save to him the enormous burden of time charges which extends through the whole of the 12 months while he is producing, harvesting, and marketing his crop.

I do not mean to say that the retail merchant profiteers at the expense of the farmer. The retail merchant when he sells on time must go without his money until the crop is ready for market. When he furnishes supplies to the farmer he knows that his only chance of getting his money for them is from what the farmer produces from the soil, and he runs some risk of a crop failure, of breakdown somewhere, of mismanagement or losses or misfortunes, or what not, and he is without his money during this time. So he has to go to the bank and borrow money in order to finance his business. Therefore we can not properly find fault with the merchant for charging the borrower, under those circumstances, what might be called an extra high profit on the credits which he extends to the farmer. At the same time, that 10 or 15 or 25 or more per cent additional in the cost of everything the farmer must have in order to produce his crop is a tremendous burden to him.

I do not know of any industry in the country that could have stood the high interest rates and the high cost of all supplies pyramided by these charges for time credits except agriculture, and it has been depressed on that account.

The idea is—and that is one purpose intended to be reached by this bill, I think—to afford a facility whereby the farmer can get cash with which he may purchase his supplies and save the enormous expense which is attached to their cost now by reason of having to purchase upon time. Hence it seems to me important that we should in this bill somewhere and somehow limit the rate of interest which can be charged the borrower when he obtains accommodation through the Federal land bank.

The limitation now, as I see it, is simply the State rate of interest. The State rate of interest is more than the farmer ought to pay in these circumstances. The Federal land banks have been established to meet his needs in a broad and general way. They afford a system that is peculiarly adapted to the industry of agriculture, and by reason of the fact that the system is superintended by the Government through its proper officers and the securities supporting the bond issues are passed upon by Government agents and must be ample fully to protect the bond issues, which are exempt from all taxes, the farmer is benefited by the low rate of interest which the bonds bear. In the farm loan act we have provided that the borrower shall not be called upon to pay in excess of 1 per cent more than the rate of interest which the bonds bear, and we say that rate shall not exceed $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, so that if the bonds, the proceeds of which are loaned to individual borrowers under the law, bear a rate of interest of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, then the borrower can not be called upon to pay more than $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent for the money which he obtains. That 1 per cent leeway was intended to cover the cost of administration; but, as a matter of fact, we find that the cost of administering the system is not over one-half of 1 per cent and, consequently, the farmer, when the bonds sell at a rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, ought to get his money at 5 per cent. We have so provided in the farm loan act which has reference to mortgage loans; but there is no provision in this bill limiting the rate of interest which the debentures shall bear.

The thought throughout this bill and the Capper bill, which we have passed, is that the State rate shall control and govern. The State rate is too high. It is proposed to provide here a system for the benefit of agriculture, for the benefit of those who produce the Nation's food, and it ought to afford them a rate of interest based on the securities which they offer which would be advantageous to them. We are not giving them any great advantage when we say that after the system shall be inaugurated they must still pay the same rate of interest which they would pay if they were to go now to any bank in the respective States and obtain accommodation.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President—

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. Did I understand the Senator to say that the rate of interest that these bonds and debentures may bear is left to the exigencies of the public as they may bid on them?

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely. No limitation as to the interest they shall bear is fixed in this bill; and I am going to propose an amendment—the Senator from Wisconsin does not appear to be here now—on page 4, line 8, after the word "Board," to strike out the period and insert the words "not exceeding 6 per cent per annum," so that if amended it will read:

Rates of interest or discount charged by the Federal land banks upon such loans and discounts shall be subject to the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board, not exceeding 6 per cent per annum.

Unless you do that, you have no limitation at all; and where does the farmer get any benefit from establishing a financial system here, issuing debentures under the supervision of the Government, with Government capital back of it—you are putting up \$5,000,000 for each of these banks—and yet leaving these debentures wide open, to be offered at any rate of interest at which the Farm Loan Board may see fit to offer them, and require the borrower to pay not exceeding $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent more than the discount rate of the Federal land bank, as mentioned on page 6, without the consent of the Farm Loan Board. Suppose the debentures bear 7 per cent, where is there benefit to the borrowers of the proceeds? Where is there any special benefit to the farmer if he has to pay on the money which he obtains through this system, furnishing the security which he is obliged to furnish, the same rate of interest that the banks charge in their commercial transactions?

Mr. SMITH. Does not the Senator think 6 per cent is high?

Mr. FLETCHER. I grant that 6 per cent is high. I merely put it at that because if I made it less there would be more objection to it, possibly. As it is now, the rate may be anything within the usury laws of the State.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that as these bonds and debentures are made nontaxable, it seems to me they would be taken up readily at 5 per cent.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should think so. The farm-loan bonds are selling readily at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and I see no reason why these debentures should not sell at 5 per cent; but, as I say, 6 per cent is merely suggested at this place as the rate of interest or discount charged by the bank. I think there ought to be some limitation there.

Mr. SMITH. The wording of the Senator's proposed amendment is that it shall not exceed 6 per cent.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; "not exceeding 6 per cent."

Upon some investigation it appears that 10 States now allow 12 per cent by contract, 23 States up to 10 per cent, and 33 States up to 8 per cent; so that in 10 States the rate might be as high as 12 per cent, and in 23 States as high as 10 per cent, and in 33 States as high as 8 per cent under this bill. I submit that if you are exempting from taxation these debentures and providing this system for the benefit, as you claim, of agriculture—and that is the purpose of it—then you are not benefiting the farmer unless you give him this accommodation at a rate of interest which he can reasonably meet; and I think you should set that out in the law, as we have done in the farm loan act. The farm loan act expressly provides that the banks shall not charge a borrower exceeding 1 per cent above the rate which the bonds bear; and here why not limit the rate at which these debentures shall be issued and then say that the farmer shall not pay over $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent—I think it ought to be 1 per cent instead of $1\frac{1}{2}$ —above the rediscount rate as provided on page 6 of the bill? That is the thing we are trying to reach here—the accommodation of the farmer upon terms and at a rate of interest which his industry will warrant and justify and can stand. If we do not accomplish that we have gotten nowhere under this system.

The fact is that the system is going to be cumbersome, no matter how it is administered. Its success is going to depend upon its administration. If these departments of the Federal land banks do not function properly, efficiently, and promptly, they will do no good at all to agriculture. The real need here is a local need. For instance, take the Columbia bank district, composed of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida. A farmer needing this accommodation—personal loans—may live seven or eight hundred miles from the Columbia bank. He needs to borrow some money for the purpose of avoiding these excessive charges, as I have indicated, on supplies where otherwise he would have to buy them on time, and when he buys them he wants cash. This system is supposed to provide a means for his obtaining cash, so that he can go and purchase for cash these things that he needs to produce his crop. That is one of the purposes of it. Living seven or eight hundred miles away from the bank at Columbia, S. C., he has to make his application and send it up there to be considered, and they refer it down to an appraiser, and that appraiser is two or three weeks in getting around to look over the security. Two or three weeks more elapse before the application is considered by the bank, and perhaps two or three weeks more elapse before he hears from his application. That is not going to meet the situation at all. A farmer is not only engaged in toiling and struggling behind the dangerous end of a mule but he is engaged in a business. You must treat him somewhat as a business man, because his occupation is a business occupation in the broad sense of the term. He wants to know what accommodation he is going to get, and he wants to know it promptly. He can not afford to sit and wait for weeks and weeks and weeks for it to be decided whether or not he is to have any accommodation at all, and, if so, perhaps only a part of what he has applied for. He has to make his arrangements.

That is one great drawback to this whole scheme here. You have not arranged it so that he can have his needs promptly considered and so that the facilities will be adapted to the local demand; and in the final analysis I do not believe you will find that this system is going to be of any vast benefit to the farmers of the country. Those living right in the vicinity of the bank, where they can have their matters looked after just as others might who go to the towns in the counties where they live and have their business attended to, will be accommodated, perhaps, to some extent; but in the case of the farmers living some distance from the bank, two or three hundred miles, from that to seven or eight hundred miles away, having to pass their applications on and have them referred and wait on appraisers and wait on this, that, and the other, the system is not going to be attractive or useful to them. They will want to go to the town near which they live, and go to their banker or their merchant, and know the same day what they are able to accomplish in the way of financial accommodations, or at least within a very few days; so that even under the most favorable circumstances, when this system is put in operation, what it will supply probably will be the communities immediately adjacent to the town or city in which the bank is located, and I am afraid they will not reach out to the wider areas extending some distance away from the location of the Federal land bank. In order to be efficacious it must meet those two prime necessities—promptness and adaptation to local needs.

It has been pointed out by the Secretary of the Treasury, in discussing this bill, that only a fraction of agricultural re-discounts could be handled, because there are only $60,000,000 provided as capital, with a possible addition of $60,000,000 more, whereas the indebtedness on farm property in the country amounts to $12,000,000,000; the mortgages outstanding now amount to $7,000,000,000, and the bank loans to farmers amounts to $3,750,000,000, and the private personal loans to farmers amount to $1,250,000,000; so that at most here you have a capital of $120,000,000 to endeavor to meet the urgent needs of the farmers. It is wholly inadequate, in the first place. It will, I hope, accomplish some good; but, as I see it, it will be beneficial mainly to those who will be immediately adjacent to and in touch with the Federal land banks. There are only 12 of those throughout the whole country, and there will be farmers living some distance away from them who, I think, will be very greatly disappointed when it comes to putting into operation the system provided in this bill.

There are other items in the bill to which I wanted to draw attention. The Senator from Wisconsin said that on page 7 he proposed to offer an amendment—I am not advised whether he has done so or not—dealing, as I understood, with the question of the meaning of the word "solely" where the bill says, "the surplus earnings of such department shall be applied solely to meet obligations and losses." I think that clause ought to be cleared up, so that it may be made perfectly plain that this capital can be used in financing the operation, in actually making the discount. There should be inserted after the word "solely" the words "to extend credit facilities as provided under Title II of this act and."

There are a few verbal changes which I will suggest as we go along, but at present I need not dwell upon them, since the Senator in charge of the bill does not seem to be present. I want, however, to insist that we must, in my judgment, in order to make this bill approach the benefit we are hoping to accomplish under it, fix some limit of the interest which these debentures shall bear.

I am inclined to think that the amendment which I have suggested on page 4 should be inserted so as to make it read:

Rates of interest or discount charged by the Federal land banks upon such loans and discounts shall be subject to the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board, not exceeding 6 per cent per annum.

And on page 5, at the end of line 12, to insert, "not exceeding 5 per cent per annum," so as to read:

Rates of interest upon debentures and other such obligations issued under this subdivision shall, subject to the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board, be fixed by the Federal land bank making the issue, not exceeding 5 per cent per annum.

That is the rate I had in mind in the discussion with the Senator from South Carolina, and I think that is where he intended to have the 5 per cent apply. In other words, the rates upon debentures should not exceed 5 per cent, and the rate of interest or discount should not exceed 6 per cent.

I will offer those amendments when they are in order, and submit them for the consideration of the Senate. That is all I care to say on the subject at this time.

PRICE OF COTTON AND FINANCIAL CONDITION OF FARMERS.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I want to call to the attention of the Senate a report appearing in the Washington Post this morning from the Cotton Exchange of New York yesterday, where a bear raid was made upon the market and the price of cotton broke several dollars a bale. I read:

NEW YORK, January 31.—The market opened barely steady at a decline of 18 to 30 points in response to relatively easy Liverpool cables, reports of a less active demand for cotton goods in Manchester, unsettled foreign exchange rates, and nervousness over foreign political affairs.

Those are some of the reasons given for the break in the price of cotton yesterday. With the shortest cotton crop except one that we have produced in many, many years, with a cotton famine threatening the world by June of this year, when cotton may be bringing 50 cents a pound, and probably can not be obtained at all by July, these market manipulators are combining to hold the price down until the last pound of cotton is taken away from the producer, the man who invested his money and who toiled through the year 1922 to produce it, with some of his debts still hanging over him. They are manipulating the market so as to get the cotton away from him so that they can hold it until the price goes up to 35 cents, maybe 40 cents, and they will make $50 a bale. What good will it do the farmer to see cotton selling at 40 cents when he has been forced to throw his cotton upon the market at a price below the cost of production? That is what happened with more than half of the crop of 1922. More than half of the crop of last year has been disposed of at a price below the cost of production.

I am in receipt of a letter from the commissioner of agriculture of the State of Texas, the biggest cotton-growing State in the Union. He gives it as his judgment that it cost 26 cents a pound to produce the cotton crop of 1922. Think of that; two-thirds of the crop sold below that figure, and to-day the price is about 27½ cents a pound. The farmer is getting just $7.50 a bale more than it cost him to produce; he is making 5 bales where he used to make 15, and he has planted 40 acres where he used to plant 18, in the boll-weevil infected area. He has to cultivate more land, as the yield is smaller per acre than formerly. The cost of production is greater, and after he has gone through the year battling with the boll weevil, buying fertilizer to put on his land, paying a good price for labor, and all that, he comes up in the market place at the end of the year and receives for his entire crop a price which yields him less than $50 profit on his one-horse cotton crop. Senators, the cotton farmers of the South can not continue this business under such conditions. They must have a living profit or they must go out of the business of producing cotton.

I want to read what a little cotton paper, called the Cotton Planter, published at Montgomery, Ala., has to say upon this subject. I read:

In August, 1918, cotton sold at 38.20 cents a pound, basis middling, in New York. This was at the rate of $191 a bale. But during the same month the same grade brought only 29.70, which is $148.50 a bale. The farmer who sold—who probably had to sell—on the day the latter price ruled lost exactly $42.50 on every bale.

In the next month—that is, September, 1918—the price again reached 38.20, and two months later was down to 27.75. In three months the difference in price amounted to $52.25 a bale.

The difference in this instance on 1 bale of cotton in three month's time was greater than the one-horse farmer of 1922 made as a profit on his whole crop of 5 bales. Was there ever such a dangerous and destructive fluctuation in a product? I read further:

The following February the same cotton was quoted at 25 cents flat and five months later at 36.60 cents. A bale worth $125 in February was worth $191 five months before and $183 five months later.

Middling cotton in New York was worth 14.10 cents a pound in February, 1917. That is $70.50 a bale. Six months later it was worth 27.85 cents, which is $139.25. The difference is $68.75.

Mr. President, Senators may notice that it lacked only $1.75 of being just exactly twice as much. I continue the reading:

In September, 1919, cotton sold for 28.45 cents—$142.25 a bale. In less than 30 days it sold for $192.75 a bale. Within another 30 days it sold for $201 a bale. Three months later it was worth only $187.55 a bale, and within 30 days was quoted at $216.25 a bale.

In July, 1920, when middling was officially quoted at 43.75, buyers were frantically offering 45 cents, which is $225 a bale. A month later nobody would buy when the price was 31.75, or $158.75 a bale. Thirty days more and it was quoted at 25.50, or $127.50; another month and it was 20.50, or $102.50; then next month it was 15.50, or $77.50, and three months later it was 11.20, or $56 a bale.

There is no excuse for such swings in price. No set of men in the world except the patient southern farmer, slow to change, would stand for it.

Where, pray, is the manufacturer who would run a plant producing a commodity which was likely to sell for $191 on one day and only $148.50 on another day during the same month, his cost of production being unchanged?

That is the situation the cotton farmer is up against. Now, I want to read other reasons for the break in the price of cotton yesterday.

Listen to this:

Reports of further good rains in the South were considered a factor on the decline.

Think of that! I want to bring these remarks I am making to-day to the attention of the Federal Trade Commission. The resolution we passed through this body yesterday has teeth in it. There is going to be an investigation, and in the speech I am now making I call upon every Member of this body from the cotton-growing States and every Member in the other branch of Congress from the cotton-growing States to make any suggestions that they think will help the Federal Trade Commission in the investigation of the conduct of the New York and New Orleans Cotton Exchanges. Certain things have got to stop. They must stop, or these exchanges are doomed. The cotton industry of the United States can not stand such fluctuations in prices. It can not stand such manipulation. It ought not to stand such manipulation, and it will not stand it.

Mr. President, something has got to be done to prevent losses to those who produce that which helps to clothe the world. The cotton speculators of the country, backed by certain spinners here and abroad, go in and bear the market and beat down the price when they are ready to buy a little of the raw material for the spinning interests. Then in a few days the price will go up again a little, and then when they get ready for another supply of cotton they go on the exchanges and put out a report that there has been rain in the cotton-producing section, and that is stated to be a reason for the break in the price of cotton three months before planting time. It is the most ridiculous thing I have every heard.

I want to comment briefly on rain. What a blessing it is. How helpful and indispensable it is. But the rain all over the Cotton Belt to-day does not amount to the popping of my finger in its effect upon the cotton crop of this year which will be planted in April and early in May. We do not begin to plant cotton until April, and they are solemnly talking about showers in the Cotton Belt being reasons for breaking the price of cotton already in existence, using the fact that there has been rain in the South as an excuse for breaking down the price of the farmer's product. It is very ridiculous. Think of rain in January being an excuse for breaking the price of cotton already in existence. These are some of the flimsy excuses that are given out by speculators as to why the price should go down. The business of the cotton producer must be delivered from such a situation. If they will not comply with the law, they must be closed.

Listen to this one:

Liverpool also reported southern hedge selling during the day.

Now, what do you think of that, Senators? Liverpool, England, reporting to New York that there was hedge selling in Alabama, South Carolina, and Texas. Is it not strange that in New York somebody could not have said that the news came there that there was hedge selling in the South? Why go such a roundabout way to put out the propaganda? Nobody sent out that report but New York. It was hatched in New York. That report was written right in the cotton exchange in New York. No cable ever brought that statement from Liverpool. That is another one of the ridiculous things we come across in the manipulation of the exchanges in the United States. How ridiculous that a Liverpool cablegram should bring the intelligence to the New York Cotton Exchange in the United States that hedge selling is being indulged in in my State and in the other Southern States. Mr. President, they must think the reading public of the United States knows very little about the cotton business.

Here is another one:

Situation got little better in the afternoon. Market firmer during the middle of the day on the report that the British Government would agree to the Anglo-American debt-funding proposal.

Now, is not that refreshing? How sweet it is to hear that about Great Britain's proposal that she was able to put over on the American commissioners, postponing the payment of the debt until two generations come and go before it is paid, at 3 per cent and 3½ per cent, while the farmers of the United States pay anywhere, have paid, from 15 to 20 per cent and up to 87½ per cent in my State. Great Britain is to get her money at an interest rate of 3 and 3½ per cent, while here on the cotton exchange the price is "firmed up" because of the British acceptance of the American proposal. Is it not a magnificent piece of diplomacy for Great Britain that our commissioners were able to put over such a fine deal? Sixty-two years, two generations and a little more, before the debt will be paid, and that is given as an excuse for giving the farmer 30 cents a bale more than they were giving him two hours before that intelligence reached the exchange.

Who is doing this work, Mr. President? How are the exchanges being run? I want to submit this information, and I shall then send a copy of my remarks to the Federal Trade Commission. Who is handling the exchange? Is the law of supply and demand permitted to operate? Is the scarcity of cotton permitted to make itself felt upon the exchange? No. If the law of supply and demand controlled, the price of cotton to-day would be from 50 to 75 cents a pound.

The law of supply and demand is suspended under the raid of these bear gamblers, backed by certain spinners here and abroad. Is the exchange being manipulated so as to enable certain interests to hold the price down?

Let me read another headline from New York:

Special to the Washington Post. New York, January 28—

This was printed in the Washington Post of January 29, 1923—

Fluctuations are of no significance.

Here is the important statement:

Steady hands are operating on exchange to prevent any new wild booms.

There it is. But what will they do to the fellow who wrote that when they find out who he is? He told the secret. He let the thing out.

"Steady hands are operating on exchange!" Selling short, maybe, and manipulating the market so as to prevent the farmer from getting the price warranted by the law of supply and demand. The law of supply and demand would say, "Give him 30 and 35 cents and more. He has not got much cotton. He has debts still hanging over him from the deflation of 1920. Let him have the good price. He is entitled to it. His crop is short. The cotton supply is small and the world demand is great. Get out of the way and let him have the price warranted by supply and demand." But no. Who constitutes the steady hands? Certain spinners here and abroad. The speculator here manipulates the market so that he can get the cotton, and then a little later on when the price goes to 35 cents, it being to-day about 27 cents, he will have made about $40 a bale in two or three months' time. The farmer can stand off and look at it, and say, "If I had been permitted to hold my cotton and keep it off the market, I would have had that $40 a bale additional"; which on a little 10-bale crop would have amounted to $400, a nice little sum for him. And God knows he needs it. But does he get it? Oh, no! He must be aided in holding his cotton until the price will yield a profit.

I have received some letters from commissioners of agriculture telling me about the debts left on the farmers by the deflation of 1920. Here is one from the State of Mississippi:

In order for the farmer to get a living profit, cotton has to bring from 30 to 50 cents.

He said further:

I should say it would take from two to five years for the farmers to recover completely from their losses following the deflation period of 1920 and 1921.

Mr. President, this is a serious thing with our people. The debt is still hanging over the farmer and the commissioner of agriculture says it will take from two to five years to get out from under the debts left on him or unloaded on him by the deflation policy in 1920 and 1921.

The commissioner of agriculture of the State of South Carolina wrote:

In answer to your question: In order to give the farmer a fair profit, cotton should now be selling for from 30 to 35 cents a pound.

You ask how long it would take the farmers of my State to finish paying the debt caused by the deflation of 1920? Under the present condition a great many of them will never be able to pay their debts brought on by deflation. So long as the monetary system of the United States is controlled as it is, I see no real hope for the farmer.

This mournful note comes from one of the hitherto greatest cotton-producing States in the Union—South Carolina. While we are figuring on the debts of foreign governments at an interest rate of 3 per cent and giving them 62 years in which to pay, the commissioner of agriculture of one of the great cotton States writes that unless the situation is changed very materially there is no hope for the cotton farmers of the United States.

The North Carolina commissioner of agriculture, speaking of deflation, said:

Many of the farmers were hopelessly broke and many others will be years recovering from the effects of deflation of 1920 and 1921.

Mr. President, I simply wanted to bring these suggestions to the attention of the Senate this morning.

Mr. President, I wish to read the headlines of another article appearing in the Washington Post of this morning, as follows:

Buying of implements shows farm prosperity.

No wonder that makes the present occupant of the chair [Mr. BROOKHART] smile. He is a friend of the farmer and comes from a State which is in dire financial distress right now. The headlines continue.

Buying of implements shows farm prosperity. Sales in December reported as double those in same month in 1921.

Mr. President, those of us who know the condition of the farmers of the United States look with pity upon those who print such headlines. They are not true. The farmers of the United States have never, in my recollection, been as hard pressed financially as they are to-day. Of course, they have to buy implements. Those they have had are worn out. They have to buy new implements and when they go deeper into debt in buying them the propagandists come out and say "The country is prosperous, the farmer has gone to buying more tools to work with." That is the sort of propaganda we have going on, and yet it has been said 25 cents a pound for cotton is enough when it costs that much and a little more to produce it.

The cotton and grain farmers have got to have a stronger regulatory hand laid against the hand of the speculating marauders of the East. The farmer has got to have some steady influence that will help make the price of his product more stable. Nearly everyone else, when he goes into business, knows what the year's work is going to bring.

The man who goes to work for wages as a rule knows, for he has a contract. The great manufacturers know. They contract in the spring of the year to sell their goods to be delivered in the fall at a certain price. They know they are going to get that figure. That is a certainty. That enables them to carry on their business. But the farmer goes in, hoping and praying that he will have a fair chance. While he is walking down the cool, moist furrow of his field, "solemn and reflective," as the former Senator from Georgia, Mr. Watson, once said, thinking of his business and how he is going to manage to come out on top, here comes a scheme into operation to fleece him, to take from him the commodity which he is producing. When he is forced in the market place to sell his products at unprofitable prices he goes back home with an empty wagon and an empty purse to a disappointed wife and disappointed children, to whom he promised to bring gifts, wearing apparel, shoes, hats, and clothes, that he is unable to furnish because of the low price which he receives for his produce. Senators, this situation has got to change.

Mr. President, something has got to be done, and I expect from time to time to contribute to the discussion of this important subject. These exchanges have got to be regulated; they have got to be made to reflect the law of supply and demand, or they have got to be put out of business. There is one of two courses open for them: They will obey the law as it is upon the statute books, or they will find the law so tight that they can not move. The cotton industry has got to live and prosper, and if the exchanges could be regulated so that they would help to distribute the cotton crop, so that they would respond to the law of supply and demand, I should have no objection to them; but I am not in favor of the exchanges if they are to be run to the hurt and injury of the cotton producer. As between these institutions, as to which one shall survive, I am for the cotton-producing industry; I am for sounding the death knell of the exchange, if that be necessary, to give to the cotton producer a fair price and a good profit. Let the Federal Trade Commission, under the resolution which was reported by the committee of which I am a member and which we passed on yesterday, go to the bottom of the subject. The exchanges can put their houses in order or prepare to go out of business. That is all I have to say on the subject this morning.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the amendments of the House to Senate bill 4390.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROOKHART in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4390) to amend the last paragraph of section 10 of the Federal reserve act, as amended by the act of June 3, 1922, which were, on page 2, line 2, to strike out the word "now" and, on the same page and line, after the word "construction," to insert "prior to June 3, 1922."

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand that an amendment takes care of the branch bank at Jacksonville.

Mr. SMOOT. It takes care of the Jacksonville branch-bank building which was started prior to the time fixed.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is my understanding; and there is another amendment striking out the word "now," which was surplusage. I think both amendments should be concurred in.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator, and I have so moved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendments of the House are concurred in.

RURAL-CREDIT FACILITIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States, to amend the Federal farm loan act, to amend the Federal reserve act, and for other purposes.

Mr. LENROOT obtained the floor.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. FERNALD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	George	McCumber	Reed, Pa.
Bayard	Glass	McKellar	Robinson
Borah	Harrell	McKinley	Smith
Brookhart	Harris	McNary	Spencer
Broussard	Heflin	Nelson	Sterling
Cameron	Hitchcock	New	Sutherland
Capper	Johnson	Nicholson	Swanson
Caraway	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Trammell
Couzens	Jones, Wash.	Oddie	Underwood
Culberson	Kellogg	Page	Wadsworth
Ernst	Kendrick	Pepper	Walsh, Mass.
Fernald	Lenroot	Pittman	Willis.
Fletcher	Lodge	Pomerene
Frelinghuysen	McCormick	Ransdell

Mr. BROOKHART. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is detained from the Senate on account of hearings before the Committee on Manufactures.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I desire to address myself to the pending amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, but more particularly, perhaps, to the general subject to which it relates and concerning which he addressed the Senate yesterday.

I do not know how many Senators may have had the opportunity to examine the amendment, or have done so whether they had the opportunity or not. I am going to be very greatly interested, Mr. President, when a roll call is had upon the amendment to ascertain how many Senators there shall be who will vote in favor of a proposition of this kind, so important, so far-reaching; a proposition that has not been considered by any committee of the Senate and one which has not been indorsed by any farm organization or any other organization, so far as I know, but for which the Senator from Iowa himself acknowledges he alone stands sponsor. Nevertheless, he said that he expected the Senate, or at least he hoped the Senate would adopt it; and yet the Senator from Iowa has complained that there has not been given sufficient time for the consideration of the provisions of the pending bill, although it has been considered by two committees, by the farm bloc, and has been before Senators for several weeks, if not months.

I am not going to undertake to address myself at any length to the provisions of the amendment, because I can not assume, Mr. President, that Senators are willing to act affirmatively upon such a subject as this without full consideration. I only wish to say in passing that on its face it affords privileges to the class of people who come under it that are not afforded to any other class of people in the United States under our banking laws; that it creates a Federal reserve bank for the special use and benefit of the class of people to whom its provisions are directed, and that, too, in one short paragraph, the full effect of which no one can foresee.

Mr. President, I am in sympathy with cooperative organizations, and it may surprise some Senators to know, after listening to the speech of the Senator from Iowa, that the bill that is now before us expressly provides that the paper of cooperative banks shall have the same privileges as the paper of any other kind of a bank. This bill, however, seeks to establish under national charter a system of cooperative banks; and it seems to me that when the Senate comes to consider that question seriously, if the present law is not sufficient to authorize and permit it, the easy and the simple thing to do would be to amend the present law in the particulars that prevent the full functioning of a cooperative bank exactly as any other bank functions. More than that the farmers have not the right to ask; and here is a curious circumstance, Mr. President:

Some of the friends of the farmer are always denouncing special privilege, and yet we almost always find those same alleged friends of the farmer asking for the farmer special privilege that they would deny to anybody else. Mr. President, special privilege in itself may be to the public benefit. Generally it is to the public injury; yet there are times when conditions and circumstances are such that a special privilege to this class or that class may be to the public benefit. For instance, the pending bill before us, reported by the committee, confers a special privilege for the benefit of the farmers in that it has the Government furnish $60,000,000 of capital, and, under certain circumstances, an additional $60,000,000, or, in all, $120,000,000 capital for the organization of personal-credit departments in farm land banks for the benefit of the farmers of the United States. That is a privilege that we do not extend to any other kind of a bank, and I think it is entirely proper; and I merely wish to say that those who denounce special privilege always in general terms and then every day come and ask for some special privilege in behalf of those whom they pretend to represent are not very consistent in doing so.

Mr. President, that is all I am going to say about this amendment. Senators, of course, will vote as they see fit upon it; but I do want to say a word with reference to the general subject of cooperation.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President—

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator says the paper of cooperative banks has the same privilege under this law as the paper of other banks. Since there are no cooperative banks, what advantage is that to the farmer?

Mr. LENROOT. I understood that the Cleveland bank is in fact, whatever its form may be, a cooperative bank, organized by the brotherhood of railway employees.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is a labor cooperative.

Mr. LENROOT. Well, it is a cooperative bank. If a labor cooperative can do it, a farmers' cooperative can do it.

Mr. BROOKHART. That bank is operating under cooperative by-laws by special agreement with its stockholders. It is organized under the regular national banking act.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly. That is what I said.

Mr. BROOKHART. I had a letter from the organizer of that bank this morning indorsing my bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Well, supposing he has—what of it?

Mr. BROOKHART. He wants the privilege of organizing a cooperative bank, the same as any other folks have the privilege of organizing a corporation bank.

Mr. LENROOT. He has that privilege now—the same privilege that anybody else has of organizing a bank.

Mr. BROOKHART. He has not.

Mr. LENROOT. He is now asking for some special privilege for himself or those whom he represents, is he?

Mr. BROOKHART. The amendment that I offered, if the Senator will notice, is not confined to farmers or laborers or anybody else. Anybody can organize a cooperative banking concern. There is no special privilege asked in it in that way.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it or not confined to producers?

Mr. BROOKHART. It says:

Provided, That associations for carrying on the business of banking under this title may be formed by any number of natural persons, not less in any case than 200.

Mr. LENROOT. And who may be members of the cooperative organization?

Mr. BROOKHART. There is no limitation on it, as I remember.

Mr. LENROOT. Perhaps it is one of the other bills in which it was limited to producers.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the Senator was in error on that. Now, the Senator suggested that if we wanted cooperative banks, the way to get them was to amend the banking law itself. That is exactly what this amendment proposes to do. It does not propose to change the national banking system. It simply puts the cooperative banks under the national banking act.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator knows that this amendment of his relates to stock subscription, and they must have capital stock. He does provide that this kind of a corporation shall have a privilege that no other bank has, in that the minimum capital is very much less than in the case of any other kind of a bank. He also knows that the difficulty, if there be any, of organizing through stock subscription under the present law, as this amendment provides that stock must be taken, is with regard to the distribution of earnings to stockholders, depositors, and borrowers. Some simple amendment might be made to the present national banking act that would obviate that difficulty, if difficulty it be, without amending the law so as to give a special privilege, a special exemption, to one class of people organizing banks under the law.

Mr. BROOKHART. But those are the provisions that make it cooperative. Without that it would not be cooperative. Those are the things necessary to make it cooperative.

Mr. LENROOT. Can not 200 persons subscribe to stock in a national bank now and become stockholders in it?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; but that would be a corporation, and not a cooperative.

Mr. LENROOT. What is the difference?

Mr. BROOKHART. The difference is that in the cooperative you limit the earnings of the capital, to start with. The next is, one man one vote, regardless of the amount of capital he owns; and the third is, the earnings are distributed to the depositors and the borrowers.

Mr. LENROOT. That is the chief thing of course, as the Senator knows—the distribution of earnings—and our present national banking laws could very easily be amended so as to give to officers of national banks the privilege of distributing the excess earnings in that way if they saw fit. The Senator knows that.

Mr. BROOKHART. If the Senator will prepare that simple amendment, I will accept it.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Wisconsin is not cumbering up this farm credit legislation with legislation that has no place upon this bill and that may tend to defeat it. I happen to be a friend of rural credit legislation.

Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa yesterday again charged, as I understood him, that there had been delay in the consideration of this bill, and so much delay that I do not know whether he said it ought to go over until the next session or not, but, at any rate, that other propositions should have further consideration. The only reference to the farm bloc in this debate, so far as I am concerned, arose over the fact that the other day the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] charged that somebody had delayed this legislation, and implied that I at least was one of the parties responsible for doing so, and that it had now become so late in the session that adequate consideration could not be given to that important question. In reply, I stated that if there was delay anywhere with reference to this farm credit legislation the responsibility was with the farm bloc, and I related the exact facts with reference to it.

Mr. President, I do not happen to be a member of the farm bloc. I have not criticized it in any way. I have stated the facts with reference to it; and, to remind the Senator from Iowa, I will state them again.

It is over a year ago that this legislation was introduced. It is nearly a year ago that I asked the Banking and Currency Committee to appoint a subcommittee to consider it. It is nearly a year ago that I argued this bill before the subcommittee. Shortly thereafter members of the farm bloc informed me that the farm bloc was considering this matter of credit legislation, and asked me not to press this legislation until the farm bloc could have an opportunity to examine, investigate, and consider not only the bill that I had introduced but other bills upon the same subject. I, having great respect for the farm bloc, acquiesced and agreed to the request. It was not very long after that before I was invited by the chairman of the farm bloc to appear before it and address myself to the provisions of the bill which I had introduced. I did so. I remained after my remarks were over. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] addressed the farm bloc. I think the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] did so. Anyway several Senators spoke, and I was informed that at that meeting a committee was appointed to consider all rural credit legislation that had been proposed. I inquired many times, and each time I learned that that committee had not made a report to the farm bloc. They did make a report in December. I again was invited to appear and be present at a meeting of the farm bloc when the committee had made its report, and I was informed that the farm bloc could not agree among themselves upon any measure relating to rural credits. That being so, I pressed to the fullest extent of my power the consideration of this bill.

The Committee on Banking and Currency immediately commenced hearings upon it, and I do not think anyone who was present can charge that committee with any delay for a single moment. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] sits before me, and he knows how they sat day after day in continuous session until they disposed of the bill.

So, I repeat, if there is any delay in this rural credit legislation, the farm bloc are responsible for the delay; but I do not criticize the farm bloc for that. I have not criticized them in any way with respect to this or any other matter. The farm bloc have done many good things, but it is not necessary in defense of the farm bloc to attempt to give them credit for things for which they were not responsible.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, my principal complaint in the matter was that the Senator from Wisconsin was fili-bustering the bill through too fast, to get back onto ship subsidy.

Mr. LENROOT. Again the Senator from Iowa, while pretending to be a friend of the farmer, may be willing to delay this legislation so that the farmer will not get any benefit from it. I am not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is it not a fact that if this legislation were unduly delayed it would be quite impossible to pass it through the House of Representatives before March 4?

Mr. LENROOT. I have stated that, and I have also stated that the farmers are commencing to prepare for their crops; and I should suppose that anyone who really wanted to help the farmers, rather than have political issues to talk to them about, would be interested in getting through at the earliest possible moment legislation for their relief.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In other words, every day is vital.

Mr. LENROOT. Every single day is vital, of course.

Mr. President, I stated that it is no criticism upon the farm bloc to show that they had not done all of the things that the Senator from Iowa attempted to give them credit for; and upon this very subject of cooperative organization among farmers—the Senator from Iowa may not know, because he was not here—with reference to the cooperative marketing bill that we passed at the last session, I think even the Senator from Iowa, loath as he is to admit that anything is good that is done for the farmer unless it bears his name or that of some of his close associates, will admit that that bill, passed at the last session of Congress, was of the very greatest value to the farmer, and if cooperative organization was to succeed in the future it was absolutely necessary that that legislation should pass. The Senator from Iowa may not know that that bill was sleeping the sleep of death, never to be resurrected so far as the farm bloc was concerned, until two Members of this body, neither of whom was a member of the farm bloc, got it resurrected, called a meeting with the chairman of the farm bloc, asked representatives of different farm organizations to meet with them, and agreed upon a bill that was put through and is a law today, but which would not have been upon the statute books if Senators had been willing to let it rest there as the members of the farm bloc at that time seemed to be willing it should.

Remember, Mr. President, I am not criticizing members of the farm bloc; I am simply saying that the Senator from Iowa should not attempt to give them credit for things they will not take credit for themselves. They have done good things. I think they were responsible, in very large degree, for the packers bill, for the grain futures bill, and for some other legislation. Another piece of legislation the Senator from Iowa attempted to give them credit for was the law enlarging the powers of the War Finance Corporation, which I think every Senator, unless he be the Senator from Iowa, will admit saved thousands of farmers of the United States from going into bankruptcy. I do not know whether the Senator from Iowa is willing to admit that or not. But what are the facts concerning that measure? The farm bloc indorsed a bill which could not have passed this body, that could not have passed the House, because it would have put the Government into the business of buying and selling farm products, and some gentlemen seem to have the idea that there is a very simple way to restore prosperity in the United States, and that is to have the Government buy everything that is produced at a high price, and then sell it to the consumer at a low price, and everybody will be happy. That was the status of that bill.

There were some other Senators who were not members of the farm bloc—

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has just referred to the purchase by the Government of large quantities of farm products for the purpose of improving the prices. Let me remind the Senator that during the period of the war large quantities of wool were bought, and were held in warehouses. Those large purchases were made in part by the Government and in part by private enterprise, and then the very moment the Government sought to sell the wool it had, and at one time placed $85,000,000 worth of wool on the market, the natural effect was to depress the price of wool in the hands of the farmers; and that would be the effect of legislation of that kind.

Mr. LENROOT. The difficulties the Senator speaks of are easily met. The Senator forgets that most of the gentlemen who urged that kind of a proposition were also of the opinion that the Government should in such case continue to buy at a high price.

Mr. POMERENE. And hold the goods, without limit.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, yes; I was on the point of saying that there were some Members of this body who believed that the farmers should have some relief in the emergency which then existed, and Senators who had no connection with the farm bloc drafted the legislation which is now upon the statute books enlarging the powers of the War Finance Corporation, which, it is admitted, was of very great benefit to the farmers of the United States.

I merely make these statements to correct the RECORD, and to assure the Senator from Iowa that, notwithstanding his own skepticism upon the subject, there are some friends of the farmer in this body who have not the honor to belong to the farm bloc, and there are some friends of the farmer who try to be helpful in constructive legislation, and do not think it necessary, on the stump and on this floor, to be constantly parading their friendship for the farmer.

I want now to refer to just one other thing that has to do with this general subject of cooperative organization. I believe, with the Senator from Iowa, that the solution of most of the economic troubles which confront the farmer lies in cooperation, cooperative marketing and cooperative buying; and may I say to the Senator from Iowa that the farmers have learned more in the last five years with reference to that subject than they had learned in 50 years previous to that time. There was one lesson the farmer had to learn with reference to cooperative marketing and cooperative buying, and that was that if it was to be a success, they could not simply regard the management of it as a white-collar job which anyone could fill, but if it was to be a success there must be efficient management, and they must be willing to pay for efficient management just the same as a private business would pay. They are learning that, and wherever they have learned it cooperative marketing is a success and has a future before it.

But let us see for a moment what kind of a future the Senator from Iowa has in mind for cooperative marketing. This is not my idea. The Senator from Iowa and I are as far apart as the poles upon the subject of farmers' cooperative associations, or consumers' cooperative associations, because the aims and purposes of the Senator from Iowa in the full development of cooperative associations are not one whit different from the aims and purposes of Soviet Russia, and Lenin and Trotski. He has a right to advocate his ideas, of course. Any Senator has a right to; but it is interesting to know just what the ultimate aim and purpose is.

I would not make that statement concerning the Senator from Iowa, of course, even though he has the right to take that position, were it not for the fact that he very frankly stated his position not long ago. I do not think he has stated it on the floor of the Senate yet, but a very short time ago, in a speech in New York City, he very frankly set forth just what his idea of the future and purpose of cooperative organizations was, and I want to quote a paragraph of that speech, made last week, I think, before the Council of Foreign Relations of New York City. I will quote just one paragraph. He said:

I want to make this council a specific proposition. I say to you it is within your power to lead this movement—

Having discussed the cooperative movement—to a speedy and world-wide success. Under the Constitution Congress regulates commerce with foreign nations and among the States. If this council would ask Congress to require that all business in interstate and foreign commerce shall be transacted under a Federal charter; that the terms of the charter shall be the Rochdale cooperative system of producers and consumers; that all antitrust laws be repealed as soon as this is effected; every farmer, every laboring man, and every soldier would join in that request.

Think of that, Mr. President. He undertakes to speak for every farmer, every laboring man, and every soldier, in the request that Congress pass legislation providing that no one shall engage in interstate commerce in the United States unless he has a Federal charter, and the Federal charter shall provide that they must be members of a consumers and producers' association, otherwise the privilege of interstate commerce shall be denied them. I challenge the Senator from Iowa to point out any distinction between the doctrine of Soviet Russia in its beginning and the proposition he now advances. There is a distinction to-day, because Lenin himself would not think of advocating such a proposition as the Senator from Iowa asked that body in New York the other night to request Congress to enact.

Then, in making that request, the Senator from Iowa seemed to forget for the time being that there is a little instrument in writing, not very long, which it does not take very long to read, but which has been in existence something like 146 years, which happens to be known as the Constitution of the United States, and the Senator from Iowa seems to have forgotten that the Constitution of the United States prohibits the passage of any such legislation as he asked the Farmers' Council to request Congress to enact.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I would like to inquire what section and article of the Constitution of the United States prohibits the Congress from regulating commerce among the States, and also foreign commerce.

Mr. LENROOT. I am very glad the Senator asked that question, because I should be very sorry to think that the Senator from Iowa would make such propositions as he does if he knew what the constitutional provisions were as construed by the Supreme Court. Yet I am surprised. The Senator is a lawyer. The Senator must know—surely the Senator from Iowa can not be ignorant of the fact—that Congress has no power to deny the privileges of interstate commerce to one class of persons and say they shall be granted to another. According to the doctrine of the Senator from Iowa, Congress could say that no one who had red hair should engage in interstate commerce, that only those who did not have red hair might do so. Does the Senator think that kind of a regulation would be valid?

Mr. BROOKHART. I should like to ask the Senator what class of our people would be prohibited from entering into interstate commerce under the Rochdale cooperative system of producers and consumers?

Mr. LENROOT. The class of men who love liberty in the United States, who are not prohibited by the Constitution or by law from joining or refraining from joining any organization. The class that would be prohibited from engaging in interstate commerce, under the Senator's suggestion, is the citizen of America who would say, "I am an American citizen, but I do not care to join a cooperative consumers or producers' society." Have I answered the Senator?

Mr. President, I thought it well worth while to take a little of the time of the Senate in setting before the Senate what the aims and purposes of the Senator from Iowa seem to be in the development of cooperative organizations.

I repeat, I doubt if there are any who do not believe in cooperative organization, who do not believe that cooperative organization will do more for the farmer than any kind of legislation can possibly do. But, Mr. President, I hope the time has come—no, I will retract that. I will say I hope there is not another Senator and not a Member of the other House who holds the idea that the Senator from Iowa apparently does—that not another Senator could be found who would say "We will by law compel you to join one of these associations, under penalty, if you do not, of denying to you the privileges of interstate commerce."

Mr. President, there are many attacks upon the Constitution these days. The Constitution, I think, should be amended in some particulars. But when doctrines like these are propounded by a Senator of the United States I say, Thank God for the Constitution.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield? I wish to ask him a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I invite the Senator's attention and also the attention of the Banking and Currency Committee to one clause of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa upon which the Senator from Wisconsin has not commented—at least I did not hear him—and that is section 15, which provides as follows:

And it is provided further that after 1,000 cooperative national banks have been organized they may establish a cooperative reserve of their own and become members thereof by subscribing for capital stock therein equal to 5 per cent of their own capital stock.

Then it provides that—

Such cooperative reserve bank may also admit as members cooperative State banks organized substantially upon the same plan as cooperative national banks.

Now, under that language, I take it, we are to have two Federal reserve systems in the country independent of each other. Everybody knows the object of the Federal reserve system. It has a great influence not only upon the rates of discount and credits to be given member banks, but upon the amount and flexibility of the currency of the United States on which business is done. Are we to have an unlimited right to establish another reserve system, apparently without any limitations whatever? I should like to hear the Senator comment on the proposition.

Mr. LENROOT. I had referred to it. I did not care to go into it at any length because I think it must be readily seen by any Senator who would take the trouble to examine the amendment, and particularly that section, that if any plan of cooperative banking is to be set up as a part of the national system, the provision would have to be very carefully worked out and drawn. But may I say that I suppose what the Senator from Iowa had in mind, although it is not expressed, is that this would be merely an additional Federal reserve bank. I suppose that is what it is. I do not know. But if it is a Federal reserve bank, the Senator from Iowa has perhaps forgotten that provision of the Federal banking law which would permit the Federal Reserve Board to order the transfer of funds from that cooperative bank and put them in the vile commercial banks he speaks of.

Mr. KELLOGG. The language, on its face, I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin, seems to establish an independent Federal reserve system. It does not say it is a part of the Federal reserve system we now have, or subject to the control of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. LENROOT. It does not, except that the Senator from Iowa has provided that the provisions of the Federal reserve act and the national bank law shall apply in so far as they are applicable.

Mr. KELLOGG. So far as not inconsistent with his amendment; but the language of the amendment is that the cooperative banks shall establish for themselves a cooperative reserve of their own—not a Federal reserve, but a separate reserve of their own.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to say to the Senator from Minnesota that when the Senator from Iowa has had more time to reflect upon it and reintroduces the amendment at the next session, as I expect he will, I am very sure he will very radically revise it himself.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I regret more than ever that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] withdrew his demand for a night session. I see more than ever the need of a cooperative school here in the Senate of the United States, especially among the standpatters.

First, I want to refer to the cooperative reserve proposition. We have two reserve systems in the United States right now. It has been stated over and again in this Chamber that something more than 8,000 banks are now eligible to the Federal reserve system and not in it. Where are they doing their reserve business? They are making their own reserve right now. They are selecting their own reserve bank and doing business with it as they please. Yet here comes a howl from Minnesota that it sounds like Lenin and Trotsky, echoing the other howl from Wisconsin. I think most of the people of Wisconsin are on Lenin and Trotsky's side, judging from the way they are voting up there lately, if that is the theory of it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President—

Mr. BROOKHART. I think the Senator will learn, when he goes back to the people in Wisconsin, that they know what a cooperative bank is and that they know what cooperation in interstate commerce means. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. The people of Wisconsin have perhaps much to answer for, but the people of Wisconsin thus far, radical as they may have been, have never even dreamed of such a proposition as that proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. We will discuss that proposition a little later. I agree that the people of Wisconsin have much to answer for. Perhaps the chief of those things is the junior Senator from Wisconsin.

But in any event I want to explain the situation a little. We will hold a little bit of the school right now. I am ready to face any American on the proposition of the right to organize cooperative societies. I said to the leaders of finance in Wall Street, to that council of foreign relations, the biggest leaders up there, "If you would come to Congress and ask this regulation of interstate commerce, the farmers, the laborers, and the soldiers would join you," and they would do so. I so said to them that I did not expect them to come, because they are not ready to yield the profit system which they have fastened on interstate commerce and which enables them to take such enormous profits without the consent of the people of the United States and to declare such enormous dividends to avoid the payment of taxes.

Now, would Congress have the right to provide a Federal charter for the transaction of interstate commerce? I know of no lawyer who ever disputed that fact. The farmer himself knows better than that. He does not have to ask a lawyer, because the Constitution says that Congress shall regulate commerce among the States and also foreign commerce. If Congress provided that those engaged in interstate commerce should take out a Federal charter it would be constitutional. No one would dispute it. If Congress then further provided that they had to earn 200 per cent on their capital, the Senator from Wisconsin would never dispute the constitutionality of that sort of provision in the charter. But if Congress would provide that those profits should be restricted by the cooperative principle, then it would be bolshevism and anarchy, as has been stated by the junior Senator from Wisconsin.

Oh, we need a little bit of education on some of these ideas. The farmers and laboring men and soldiers of the country are wakening up to them and are talking of this proposition. I have not the slightest doubt of the power of Congress to enact such a law. I have not the slightest doubt that the most reactionary court in the country would hold it constitutional, because the plain terms of the Constitution say that Congress shall regulate foreign commerce and commerce among the States.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I asked for the section or article that is violated and the Senator from Wisconsin got eloquent, leaned back on his dignity, and shot off some hot air, but he never stated it. I now yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I will say to the Senator that if he will read the decision in the child-labor case, rendered in a case involving the first child labor law, he will not thereafter, because he is a lawyer, repeat the statement he has just made.

Mr. BROOKHART. I know something about that, too. That was a proposition that we could not invade the States with the interstate commerce clause. I am only talking about interstate commerce.

Mr. LENROOT. That was interstate commerce. We attempted in that law—and I had something to do with it—to deny the privilege of interstate commerce in order to protect the child labor within the State, but the Supreme Court of the United States held that Congress had no power to do that thing under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution.

Mr. BROOKHART. To do certain acts wholly within the State, which they held were not within interstate commerce. I have not proposed anywhere that there be included any provision that was not interstate commerce. I understand that distinction perfectly well. No; there is always a reactionary always ready to find some reason to halt the advance. He is always ready to cite the Constitution, if that will do; if not, then he cites something else. He never sees the light of progress. He never sees the interest of the common man. That is the trouble. That is the reason why we are going to pass farm legislation that amounts to nothing for the farmer.

Now, the little simple amendment which I have proposed to the pending bill does not force anything on anybody. It does not attempt even to do the things that I asked the big financiers of New York to support. It gives a permissive right to organize a simple cooperative bank. There are thousands and tens of thousands of them organized and in successful operation in the world right now, organized every time by the common, plain people of the different countries. They are serving the needs of the agricultural people in every country where they are in operation. But the Senator, who does not belong to the farm bloc, who speaks for the banker bloc, the Wall Street bloc, the United States Chamber of Commerce bloc, and all those blocs, is opposed to giving to this great class of our people, the 7,000,000 farmers, the 6,000,000 laboring men, the several other millions of brain workers who earn their living in the country by brain work, authority to form an organization that would enable them to organize their own little savings under their own control, to be used for their own benefit. No; he wants to continue a system which by the structure of its organization takes those little savings, piles them up ultimately in the big Wall Street banks, and leaves in the hands of a few men the economic power that goes with the control of all that vast capital.

I do not know in how many wars he served. I do not know how many times he has volunteered to defend his flag, but the Senator comes back and intimates against the man who is willing to stand for these people against him and against Wall Street or any other crowd that that man belongs with Lenin and Trotsky. All right; I do not care. I have been called those names ten thousand times. That is the reason I carried every county but five in my State. The common people of this country have got past all of that stuff. I was told when I first came down here that I would have to face a conspiracy of this kind of charges, and it has appeared to-day on the floor of the Senate of the United States. I am ready to face it here or anywhere else.

I say that the men who are trying to subvert the Constitution of the United States are this same combination of capitalists who recognize no rights of the common man, who ignore and care for nothing except to take exorbitant profits at the expense of the farmer and laborer and the common man of this country.

I did not come to the Senate to represent those men and those combinations. I came to fight them, and I will be here doing it as long as I have breath to do it. I think this is a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people. I think the Republican Party, to which I belong, is the party of that idea, and if it has strayed away under the leadership of the ideas advocated by the Senator from Wisconsin I am ready to fight to bring it back. It came back in Iowa, and it came back in Wisconsin. No longer by calling names, no longer by denouncing somebody, can the thoughtful people of the United States be turned from the real question at issue.

Vote down this amendment if you wish and say to the farmers and the laboring people and the common people, "You shall not have an organization within which to mobilize your own little savings; we propose to take those savings and handle them for you whether you wish it or not"—do that if you like, but I will be here fighting it at the next session of Congress. There will be a somewhat different tone of voice in the Senate at the next session, and it may be we shall fare better.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am going to say merely a word with reference to the remarks of the Senator from Iowa. I wish to read but a line of the bill as reported by the committee, as originally introduced by me, and as I am asking the Senate to pass it to-day. As to those who shall have the privileges of the bill, it covers—any national bank, State bank, trust company, rural credit corporation, incorporated live-stock loan or farm credit company, savings institution—cooperative bank, or cooperative credit or marketing association of agricultural producers.

Now, note—

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President—

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Iowa is so careless in his statement of fact that I do not care to go further with that.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I wish to concede, as I have stated all the time, that the Senator's bill recognizes the belligerency of a cooperative association, but that is all.

Mr. LENROOT. No.

Mr. BROOKHART. The bill recognizes that there is such a thing and that business will be transacted with it, but that is all.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator said I was trying in this bill to prevent the organization of cooperative banks and insisted on taking the money away from them.

Mr. BROOKHART. I still say that it does not create such a bank or provide any way of creating it.

Mr. LENROOT. It does create such banks. They may be created just as many thousands of State banks to-day are created. It is State banks mostly that will be affected by the bill. In any State, with the permission of the State government, cooperative banks may be organized, and when organized this bill gives cooperative banks the benefit of its provisions. The Senator knows that, and yet he made the statement he did a few moments ago.

Mr. BROOKHART. I know this bill as it was originally prepared did not authorize the organization of any cooperative bank or of any other cooperative society.

Mr. LENROOT. No; nor of any other kind of bank.

Mr. BROOKHART. It proposes to transact business with them; that is all. That amounts to but very little. I am willing, however, to give credit to the bill for that; it helps that much; but this whole proposition is worthy as well as one little corner of it.

Mr. President, I desire at this time to withdraw the amendment to the pending bill providing for cooperative banking, but give notice that I shall offer it again before the final vote is taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I concede that the measure before us indicates at least some response to the demand of the great agricultural interests of the country that Congress enact laws governing the financial system that will be suitable to conditions surrounding that great industry. I do not feel that the measure in its present form is entirely void of helpful provisions. It is, to a large extent, copied after the act reviving the War Finance Corporation, and placing within it certain authority and power to make loans in order to assist in carrying on our agricultural industries.

In some localities of our country the pending measure will extend additional relief to that already provided by the War Finance Corporation act under which we are operating at the present time. In other localities, considering the character of the agricultural industries within those sections, the measure will afford no greater relief than, and probably not so much relief as, is now enjoyed under the existing law governing the administration of the War Finance Corporation.

I have thought as I read over this bill that the members of the committee, however good may have been their intentions, were familiar only with that portion of our country in which staple agricultural commodities are produced. They do not seem to take into account to any marked extent the vast domain in this country in which the production of perishables constitute agriculture in a major proportion at least. In localities where the production of staple commodities constitute principally the agricultural industry it is provided that upon the indorsement of a bank credit may be obtained from the farm-loan banks. It is also provided that credit may be obtained upon security based upon chattel mortgages or warehouse receipts upon those staple products from the farm-loan banks, provided the farmer utilizes the banks in the country as the intermediary or the underwriter, for it is necessary, in order for any farmer to have his security used, provided it is not the security of a cooperative association, for that security, before it is eligible for an advance or a discount in a farm-loan bank, to bear the indorsement of the bank from which the loan is negotiated. It is provided, however, that farm organizations, farm-loan associations, or marketing associations composed of farmers engaged in the production of staple products, may transact business directly with the farm-loan banks. The restriction provided by the use of the words "staple agricultural products" precludes from the advantage of any direct negotiation with the farm-loan banks the farmers of any section of the country engaged in the production of perishables, because the privilege is not extended to the farmers, even when cooperating in an association, to secure advances from the farm-loan banks, except in the event that they are engaged in the production of staple agricultural products. In consequence, this measure absolutely precludes the thousands and the millions of the farmers and growers in this country who are engaged in the production of perishable commodities from the privilege of obtaining advances or discounts from the farm-loan banks directly.

This class of our farmers are expected to go into their local banks, arrange for loans with their local banks, and then the local bank, if it sees proper to do so, may, with its indorsement, use that security for the purpose of obtaining a rediscount or an advance from the farm-loan bank under the provisions of this measure. In consequence, this bill provides no further relief whatever for the fruit grower or the truck farmer of my State and other States than is provided for him under the existing law governing the operations of the War Finance Corporation.

Mr. President, I come from one of the most thrifty and progressive and, from the standpoint of the investor, as well as from many other viewpoints, one of the most attractive States in the Union; yet within my State the citrus-fruit industry, the truck-farming operations, and agricultural endeavors of similar character constitute in a major proportion, at least, its agriculture. In the northern part, which is a most excellent farming section, we produce staples very largely—cotton, corn, and crops of that character—and this extends into the central part to quite an extent; but in a considerable portion of my State agriculture centers very largely around the production of citrus fruits and the production of perishables. This bill applies to staple farm products. Of course, I should like very much to have that character of agriculture included under the head of the term "staple farm products," but, as I understand, it was not the purpose and intention of the committee, in putting that restriction upon the security, that it should include perishable products. The intention was rather that it should be restricted to nonperishable products.

There is a way whereby those engaged in the fruit industries and in truck farming can have an opportunity to obtain advances and loans just the same as those engaged in the so-called staple agricultural activities—that is, to make eligible for loans and for advances from the farm-loan banks securities that are based upon mortgages upon real property. In order to try to correct this objectionable feature of the measure as it exists at present, I have proposed an amendment making a mortgage upon real property used for producing and in connection with producing agricultural crops eligible as a security for advances and for rediscount purposes. There is no better class of security than that. The committee, when it wrote into the bill that mortgages upon cattle should be acceptable, recognized the policy of accepting mortgages and collateral of that character. As a matter of fact, I think that in the mind of the average financier or person who is well informed upon the question of securities the soil upon which the crop is produced and the buildings and improvements located upon a farm would be recognized as certainly as staple and as dependable security as a mortgage upon cattle or live stock.

I do not want to question anybody's motives, and I do not question them; but when I read this bill I am impressed that those who drafted the bill were thinking about wheat, were thinking about corn, they had to think about cotton, and then the cattle people of the West said, "Why, we must have some provision under which we can receive the benefits of this bill for our cattle industry," so in a number of instances they specifically wrote into the measure that these privileges should be extended to live stock, and that a chattel mortgage upon live stock should be eligible for advances and for discount purposes; but it seems that nobody happened to think about the man who, with his apple orchard or his orange grove or his truck farm, may require some financial assistance. It seems that nobody was there looking after the interests of those engaged in this character of agriculture. Certainly the man engaged in fruit production and in vegetable production should be afforded the same opportunity and privilege of obtaining credits for the planting, the production, the harvesting, and the marketing of his crops as those engaged in the production of staple agricultural products, provided, of course, that he can furnish ample and safe security. This he can do. This can be easily accomplished by having him furnish, if he sees fit to do it—and he should have that privilege—a mortgage upon his real estate; and there is no better security.

Under the provisions of this bill a farmers' organization or association whose members are engaged in the production of agricultural products of a staple character can go to the farm-loan bank and obtain money without any collateral other than the notes of the association, as I recall, just so they say that the money was advanced or is being used in carrying on staple farming. The farmer has to belong to an association, however, to enjoy that privilege. On the other hand, under the provisions of the bill an association of which a fruit grower in my State is a member who has property worth probably $25,000, requiring for the purpose of fertilizing, working, and caring for his grove and the production of a season's crop perhaps $2,500, has absolutely no privilege to apply to a farm-loan bank and obtain loans, even though that grower is willing to give a mortgage upon his property for $2,500, and his property is worth $25,000.

I do not think a proposed system that denies this privilege to a great class of those engaged in the agriculture of our country fully meets the situation and the requirements. What is this farmer to do? His only remedy is to go to his bank. He knocks at the door of the bank and says, "I want to borrow $2,500. My next crop probably will amount to four or five thousand dollars, but I need money to buy fertilizer; I need money for spraying; I need money for plowing and hoeing, and so on. I want to borrow $2,500."

If the bank sees fit to loan him the $2,500, then as soon as his obligation gets into the hands of the bank it constitutes a collateral upon which the bank, with its indorsement, can negotiate an advance or can negotiate for a rediscount with the farm-loan bank or with the Federal reserve bank. It just facilitates matters a little as far as the banking facilities are concerned, and aids the banker, and the farmer indirectly obtains some benefit; but that is not all. You deny this great class of our people engaged in agriculture the privilege of negotiating directly, either through associations or otherwise, with the farm-loan bank.

Of course, I appreciate, and the farmers of my section appreciate, the privilege of a bank having the opportunity, as it now has—it already has that opportunity under the present war finance law—of taking the farmers' security and of using it for the purpose of reinforcing the funds of the bank. That necessarily, especially in times of stress, gives the bank more funds with which to operate. It not only helps the farmer in that way, although his benefits have to come by a circuitous route, but it helps to strengthen and to fortify the bank, and it gives the bank greater latitude in meeting the commercial demands upon it. So I am heartily in sympathy with that provision of the law as it now exists; and when the War Finance Corporation bill was pending here it was my pleasure to suggest and have adopted one or two amendments to that bill, which extended or enlarged the scope of the banks in the acceptance of securities that would be considered eligible for rediscount purposes; but the contention I make is that the law ought to go a little further and make it possible for an association of growers engaged in truck farming or an association of growers engaged in citrus-fruit production to have the same privilege to go to the farm-loan bank and obtain advances in the form of loans that the farmers and the growers engaged in staple-crop production in an association may have. Coming from a section where this is to a great extent the character of farming that is engaged in, I resent the discrimination against the citrus-fruit producer and against those engaged in vegetable production; and what I say in regard to my own State will apply to other States where they produce apples, peaches, grapes, and other perishables.

Take the condition in the State of California. In California, in a very large part of the State, those engaged in agriculture will have absolutely no privileges under this bill except to carry on their transactions through their local banks. Their exchanges, their cooperative organizations and associations, are absolutely barred from any direct transactions with the farm-loan banks under the provisions of this bill, although those engaged in the production of grain or wheat—their neighbors, if it should happen that they are their neighbors—through their organizations can ask for loans, and under the law their securities would be eligible for loans.

My criticism and complaint is that the bill has discriminated against those who are engaged in the production of perishables, and there is no occasion and no reason why that discrimination should exist. I suggest the remedy to correct that discrimination by proposing that a mortgage upon real property used for producing and in connection with the production of agricultural products shall be made eligible as a collateral along with the other character of securities enumerated in the measure. This bill does not go so very much further than the Federal reserve law at the present time on the question of making eligible for rediscount farmers' securities.

Under the present Federal reserve law notes based upon advances for agricultural purposes, which are made payable within six months, are eligible for rediscount by the Federal reserve banks. That is the law at the present time. What does the pending bill propose? The pending bill proposes that if warehouse receipts are appended, or there is a chattel mortgage upon staple agricultural products, then the security will be acceptable if it is not made payable for a period of not exceeding nine months, but unless the security furnished to obtain a loan for agricultural purposes is secured by warehouse receipts, by chattel mortgage upon staple agricultural products, or upon cattle—and provisions making cattle good security are always put into such bills, and I am glad of it—unless that condition exists, then the securities are not eligible; they are not eligible under the provisions amending the Federal reserve law for rediscount purposes, and certainly are not eligible for the bank to use upon which to obtain the issuance of Federal reserve bank notes. It is provided that if this character of securities has with it a mortgage or a warehouse receipt, or a chattel mortgage upon live stock, then it is eligible for a period of not exceeding nine months and can be used as a basis for obtaining the issuance of Federal reserve bank notes.

I propose an amendment, now on the desk, adding another clause, to the effect that a mortgage upon real estate used for the producing, or in connection with the producing, of agricultural products shall come within the same class of securities. If we adopt that, then we will extend a credit to those engaged in the production of perishable products, and it will in no wise jeopardize the stability of our financial institutions or impair the usefulness of the system, but, on the contrary, it will help to stabilize the securities, in so far as advances to the fruit grower or to the truck farmer are concerned, and it will help to stabilize and to make more useful the system of credits proposed. Without it, we have not provided ample relief to those engaged in the production of perishable products.

We can gain a little idea from comparisons in discussing this question of the stability of credits. Just think of the provision of the Federal reserve bank law dealing with what may be ordinarily termed "commercial" paper. Under the present law all that is necessary is for the bank to pass upon the security offered in connection with ordinary commercial transactions, and that security, when accepted by the bank and offered by the bank, is eligible for rediscount, provided it is for a period of not over 90 days, in certain transactions, and six months in transactions affecting agriculture. Those securities at present under the Federal reserve bank law are eligible for rediscount and constitute security upon which Federal reserve bank notes may be issued, and no mortgage or warehouse receipt is required. But when you come to consider the financial needs of agriculture some say that you are departing from safe financial paths whenever you say that even a mortgage upon real property for advances or loans made to carry on agriculture is not secure and should not be made eligible for rediscount at your farm loan bank.

I am at a loss to understand why it is that if this character of security is good for six months, even to be used for the purpose of obtaining an issuance of Federal reserve notes, which, of course, are money, the next day afterwards, or seven months, or eight months, or nine months afterwards, the same security is not stable and should not be recognized. That is what the pending bill means, however.

A fruit grower or truck farmer can go to the bank, without this bill becoming a law, and can borrow $1,000 for six months, if the bank is willing to lend it to him. He does not have to give a mortgage. His note for the $1,000, payable in six months, in the hands of the bank is eligible under the existing law for rediscount purposes with the Federal reserve bank. It is also eligible as security upon which the bank may obtain an issue of Federal reserve bank notes. If that security is stable for six months, then I can see no logical reason why the farmer should have no privilege of having it used for the interval between six months and nine months, as is prohibited by the bill now pending.

This bill denies to him nine months' credit unless he gives warehouse receipts or chattel mortgages upon staple products or live stock. But where he is engaged in the production of nonperishables he is barred against a nine months' loan, even upon a mortgage.

It is plain this bill extends to him no benefits or privileges which he does not enjoy under the existing law, and I agree with the Senator from South Carolina that the time should be extended to 12 months as the maximum limitation upon loans instead of limited to nine months, as now provided in this bill. No system is provided which will accommodate itself to the needs of agriculture when loans are limited to nine months. Every farmer will agree with my statement. Many farmers desire loans for 12 months. Some of them might borrow two or three months before it is absolutely necessary; but the farmer does not want to go along, groping in the dark for two or three or four months, not knowing whether he is going to have money to carry on his farm operations or not; and a great majority of the farmers try to make their financial arrangements, where they have not means of their own with which to operate, at the beginning of the planting season. Yet, under this bill they are restricted to nine months.

I could not help noticing a difference when it came to the question of writing a clause in the bill to take care of bills of lading, bills of exchange, drafts, and securities of that character, based upon exports and imports, used in foreign trade. The period is six months in the case of that class of paper on a character of business that is constantly going on, day in and day out, and in which they should have several turnovers in six months, you might say. Yet they give them a credit of six months and make their paper eligible, but want to restrict the farmer's paper to nine months when in all reason he needs credit for a longer period. If that character of paper is entitled to six months' credit, then a farmer is certainly entitled to 12 months' credit. I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and feel that it should be adopted. If we do not adopt it, we will not be meeting the needs of agriculture; we will not be endeavoring to our uttermost to establish a system of finance that will be applicable to the status and condition of the farmer, and why should we not do so? I have not heard anybody upon this floor give a good, sound, logical reason why we should fail in doing our duty by America's millions of farmers.

I think the farmers of this country—call their friends "blocs" or whatever you want to call them—are entitled to make some suggestions and give some advice and counsel regarding what they need in their industry, and I do not think there is any reason why their friends should be criticized because they stand up and try to bring about legislation which will meet the demands of the industry in which they are engaged. I find others representing the railroads—the big corporations and the big interests of the country. To what bloc do they belong?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Florida will allow me, if the notes secured by the things the farmer produces in the form of staple agricultural products are eligible as the basis for the issuance of Federal reserve notes, why should the farmer not be entitled to a lifetime for those Federal reserve notes commensurate with the peculiar character of his business, in view of the fact that he produces the commodities upon which the currency can be issued?

Mr. TRAMMELL. He produces the commodities, and whatever prosperity we enjoy in this country comes first through the industry and the labor and toil of the man who tills the soil. He is the creator in the development of wealth, and without him we could have no prosperity, we could have no industries in which others could engage and accumulate and make their fortunes and others obtain a livelihood.

It is a very peculiar thing that the farmer has been neglected so long. I do not say that we should do anything for the farmer but treat him fairly and justly. Give him a fair deal is all I ask. A few years ago if one talked about doing justice by the farmer, there was always a cry of paternalism, and even yet some would ignore the rights of those who produce the food and the raiment for the more than a hundred million citizens of the Republic.

My position is that we should formulate a financial system that would meet the conditions surrounding the farmer's business, just the same as we do when we come to deal with the commercial or manufacturing interests of the country. I have found that the commercial and manufacturing interests of the country and the bankers to a large extent usually get what they want in the way of legislation. Legislation to a very large extent is written in accordance with their suggestions. In dealing with the transportation companies of the United States the railroad law, which a majority of Congress passed in 1920, met very largely with their approbation. They were busy looking after the situation and finally had a law enacted that met to a very large extent their wishes. I am proud to say I voted against this law.

At that time when it came to the question of providing financial assistance, there was no restriction, no suggestion that the railroads should not have more than $1,000,000 for each road or $2,000,000 for each road, and that the money should be used only for the purpose of meeting losses.

The Congress very beneficently extended loans to the railroads of the country out of the Public Treasury amounting to something like $700,000,000 or $800,000,000, and yet some people do not want us to provide for, say, $120,000,000, $150,000,000, or $200,000,000 of credit—not providing the money, but merely providing the credit—to make secure a banking system for the purpose of aiding the agriculture of the country. No one offered any criticism particularly about loaning the railroads of the country $700,000,000 or $800,000,000 based upon collateral that was not as good collateral and not as good security as that which would be furnished by the average farmer of the country when negotiating a loan.

I have proposed an amendment to the provision providing that $5,000,000 shall be authorized for each of the farm loan banks. I have proposed that it be amended to increase the amount to $15,000,000 for each bank. My idea is to fix a liberal latitude or margin in the amount. The capital stock is not to be paid for by the Government except as the money is needed, therefore if we fix it at $15,000,000 instead of $5,000,000, and the bank only needs $5,000,000, the Government would not be called upon to finance to the extent of more than the amount needed. On the other hand, if under the provisions of the bill there should be a demand for $12,000,000 by a given bank, and if we have restricted the capitalization, so far as the Government taking stock in it is concerned, to $5,000,000, then the bank would be absolutely unable to meet the demands and requirements upon it which have been authorized under the bill. So I have proposed an amendment providing that the capital which is to be secured for it by the Government shall be $15,000,000.

Mr. President, I approve of the purpose and the object of a system to provide farm credit. For many years I have advocated a revision of our banking laws looking to the expanding and enlarging of our banking system to such an extent that it would accommodate the agricultural interests of the country just the same as it has accommodated and facilitated the commerce of the country. I do not feel that the pending measure has gone as far as the conditions of agriculture require, but half a loaf is better than none at all. I realize that even in its present form the bill will accomplish a limited amount of good. For that reason, while I have criticized and suggested improving several of the provisions of the bill, it is my purpose to support the measure on account of the limited benefit that will result to our agricultural interests. But I think there is no reason why the bill should not be perfected so as to meet the conditions of those who are engaged in the production of perishable products when ample security can be given.

I trust that Senators will seriously consider the point I have raised upon this particular feature of the bill. If we leave it unamended, the fruit growers and truck farmers will be barred absolutely from any opportunity to get credit, through a cooperative association or any organization of their own, directly from a farm-loan bank. They would be left exclusively to the facilities afforded them through the local bank and could only obtain such indirect benefit under the provisions of the bill as might come to them through their local bank.

Mr. President, I have no criticism to make of our banks in general. I think that the banks of the country, considering the demands upon them—I know in my State it is true—have displayed a spirit of cooperation and sympathy to a very large extent for agriculture, and within all reason most of them have tried to assist agriculture by giving the necessary credits. I do not anticipate that under the bill there would be any disposition other than that of cooperation and assistance toward agriculture on the part of local banks in Florida. But it does seem, if we are trying to establish a system to furnish farm credits, that we should not leave without the provisions of that system a very large and necessary class of those engaged in agriculture, and that we should not deny them, when they are in associations and cooperating, the privilege of furnishing their credits to the farm-loan banks.

I have proposed not only the amendment which I sent to the desk on yesterday but several others to-day, with the hope that they may be adopted and that we will give to all engaged in the agricultural industry, whether producers of perishable or nonperishable products, the same fair and just consideration.

RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I desire to present for the consideration of Senators this joint resolution of the houses of the Kansas Legislature, now in session:

Whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission in its various decisions has construed the transportation act as enlarging its jurisdiction over questions involving intrastate rates, fares, and charges, and has recognized as the controlling element in such decisions the revenue needs of the carriers in a particular group without particularization or definiteness as to the extent of discrimination between persons, companies, firms, corporations, or localities, which was the extent of its jurisdiction prior to the transportation act, as evidenced by court decisions: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Kansas, That we urge our Senators and Members of Congress to use their influence and best endeavor to have the transportation act amended, restricting the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission over matters involving intrastate rates, fares, and charges to that exercised under the interstate commerce act and prior to the passage of the transportation act.

Resolved further, That we urge our Senators and Members of Congress and all other Members of the Congress of the United States to support Senate bill 1150, introduced by Senator CAPPER, and House bill 7947, introduced by Representative HOCH, which bills provide for the amendment of the transportation act and limit the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission over matters involving intrastate rates, fares, and charges to that formerly exercised by that body prior to the passage of the transportation act.

I also desire to present a resolution adopted by the Kansas-Missouri Hardware and Implement Dealers' Association, Kansas City, Kans., January 18, 1923:

Resolved, That freight rates on farm products should be reduced to pre-war levels, and increased credits and lower rates of interest would enable the farmer to refund his indebtedness, liquidate his losses, and finally pay out.

I am aware, Mr. President, that it is unlikely that this Congress will be able to turn its attention to the transportation problem. I am also aware, Mr. President, as everyone in the least advised as to our domestic economic situation must be, that the next Congress must not only consider the transportation question but must find a solution for it in the interest of the whole people. In my opinion transportation will be the big question before the Sixty-eighth Congress. The present high plane of transportation rates is an embargo on the prosperity of a vast majority of our people.

Mr. President, railroads rank second to agriculture in the industrial procession of the United States. A small second at that. Both outrank manufacturing. Railroads and manufacturers prosper. Agriculture fights for its life.

In 1922 railway net operating incomes increased $145,000,000. Operating expenses decreased nearly $140,000,000. Julius H. Parmelee, director of the bureau of railway economics, is authority for this statement. Forty railroad systems show earnings in excess of the 6 per cent fair-return standard fixed by the transportation act. The Interstate Commerce Commission, responding to a resolution of inquiry introduced by me, so reports.

Last year the people of the United States paid the railroads $5,500,000,000. This is almost twice as much as the National Government cost them.

As for the manufacturers and corporations, the flood of stock dividends, the usual cash dividends, and the more than a few extra dividends prove their prosperity.

During this time and for more than two years and a half the farming industry, biggest industry of all, has been fighting for existence. It has been producing, usually, at a loss, sometimes at almost a total loss, selling at next to pre-war prices, and paying higher-than-war freight tolls to reach its markets.

In some quarters we are blamed for insisting that the tail has been wagging the dog long enough; that freight rate reductions not only are necessary to get agriculture on its feet but that the roads can not longer afford to refuse rate reductions in the interest of general prosperity. We are also blamed for insisting that we can not have fair and equitable rate making until section 15a, the rate-making clause in the Cummins-Esch Act, is repealed. Yet this is absolutely the case.

Mr. President, I am not a railroad baiter. I want the roads to prosper and to obtain a fair return on their capital. But I know they are endangering their own welfare and the country's so long as they delay these reductions. Some one must keep this truth before Congress and must talk plain talk about it.

My recent remarks in this Chamber on rate reduction and the repeal of the rate-making clause brought a storm of criticism from that section of the press which holds a brief for the railroads—the railroad magazines and a few of the big city papers. While these criticize, excessive rates are driving farmers to the wall. These unjust rates stand between the farmer and his markets, between the farmers and the only means a majority of them have for obtaining ready money. Knowing this, the American Farm Bureau Federation said at its recent annual convention in Chicago:

We demand the further reduction of freight rates until they shall be brought into proper working relation to the purchasing power of farm crops.

One of these critics, the New York Commercial, attempts to show that a substantial reduction of rates would benefit farmers to the extent of only 1 per cent of their expenses.

A farmer's returns come from what he gets for his output. This is what militates so viciously against him now. When freight charges alone take 10 to 20 per cent from gross prices, which scarcely meet the cost of production, no sort of juggling with figures can soften the blow. Freight charges do this and often more on long hauls. The farmer more often than not is a long-haul shipper. Kansas, for instance, produces more than a bushel of wheat for every man, woman, and child in the United States. The price the Kansas wheat raiser gets for his wheat delivered is the market price at destination less the freight he has paid. What is left is what he gets for his grain. Often he does not get the cost of production.

It costs a farmer twice as much to ship a carload of apples as it does a coal operator to ship a carload of coal the same distance. The farmer receives for his apples less than the cost of production, while consumers in cities pay 10 cents each for the fruit.

Here is a commission man's table showing what the apple and potato grower get out of the selling price of their crop and how much more the railroads charge for shipping it. Figures also are given for coal. It is a highly instructive table:

Commodities.	Received per ton.	By producer.		By railroad.
			Per cent.		Per cent.
Apples.....	$33.00	$15.00	45.5	$18.00	54.5
Potatoes.....	22.00	10.00	45.45	12.00	54.55
Coal.....	11.25	5.50	48.8	5.75	51.2

Prominent among those who have taken issue with my position on this vital question of transportation and the need of rate reduction is W. B. Storey, president of the Santa Fe. In a letter to me taking exception to my remarks in the Senate a few weeks ago on this question, Mr. Storey suggests that heavy traffic does not necessarily imply heavy earnings. Mr. Storey's letter was given to the Associated Press and was widely published. In this letter Mr. Storey goes on to say:

You speak of enormous business being done by the railroads and suggest that they divide their prosperity with the farmer. * * * I can say definitely that if 4 per cent is all that can be earned in a year of heavy business like this the railroads will necessarily have to postpone still further the day when they can furnish adequate facilities to move the farm products of the country.

In my remarks a few weeks ago I cited a number of roads in the same class as the 40 since reported by the Interstate Commerce Commission that were earning more than their regular dividends. The Wall Street Journal of December 14 announced that the Michigan Central had declared an additional dividend of 6 per cent and its regular semiannual dividend of 4 per cent.

This road declared dividends of 14 per cent net for 1922, compared with 6 per cent for 1921, although that year it earned 41.23 per cent net on its capital stock.

Regular dividends of 7 per cent annually are being paid by the Great Northern Railway. I learn from a circular advertising an issue of gold bonds by this company that in no year during the last 10 has this road's income been less than twice the charges, and that it has averaged about 2½ times all charges. As stated, its income from its Burlington holdings includes only the cash dividends received on the company's holdings of Chicago, Burlington & Quincy stock, "although the Burlington's earnings were more than 50 per cent in excess of the dividends paid."

The income of the Southern Pacific is reported to have averaged more than twice all charges for the last 10 years and to have amounted to 2.24 times the charges in 1921. In the year 1922 the net railway operating income of this road was nearly $10,000,000 greater than in its highly prosperous preceding year.

The Delaware, Lackawanna & Western has paid dividends of 20 per cent or more for many years, and is still paying them.

In addition to the 40 or more railroads reported by the Interstate Commerce Commission as earning more than the 6 per cent fair-return rate, the big Pennsylvania system, Wall Street reports, will show earnings for 1922 in excess of 6 per cent on its capital stock, exclusive of a special dividend of 20 per cent declared by the Pennsylvania Co. in December, amounting to $16,000,000. The Pennsylvania was included among the roads whose returns did not show any excess earnings based on claimed valuation in the recent report of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the Senate.

Another road, the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac, declares a 100 per cent "dividend obligation," a form of stock dividend.

The roads have done the biggest year's business in their history despite the high rates. Business could pass these costs on. The farmer could not. He had to suffer. The number of cars loaded with all commodities other than coal during 1922 was the greatest in railroad history, exceeding by 16 per cent the total for 1921 and surpassing by 3½ per cent that for 1920. This statement is made by the car-service division of the American Railway Association.

The roads handled 36,265,178 cars of revenue freight other than coal, compared with 31,347,816 in 1921, and 35,036,022 cars in 1920, hitherto the biggest year's business ever done by the railroads.

Loading of agricultural products also was the heaviest on record. Two million four hundred and sixty-seven thousand three hundred and fifty-eight cars were loaded with grain and grain products alone. This is an increase of 7.61 per cent over 1921 and 34 per cent over 1920.

Live-stock loadings for 1922 were 1,637,923 cars, which is 9.42 per cent more than 1921 and 5.44 per cent over 1920.

In shipments of merchandise and miscellaneous freight 1922 established a new record, with a total of 27,143,591 cars. This is an increase of 3,297,193 cars over 1921 and of 1,619,674 cars more than 1920.

The five months' mine strike cut coal tonnage to 93 per cent of the year before—a good showing for the roads. Their revenue coal shipments totaled 7,448,341 cars for the year. This effort of the railroads to meet the needs of the country for coal during the time the autumn grain movement was on cost the farmer dearly.

Although in normal years freight traffic on railroads shows a marked decline after October 15, the roads did a record-breaking business all fall. And for the month of December, 1922, as reported by the car-service division, the loading of all classes of revenue freight, including coal, was the greatest for that month in railroad history, and exceeded by nearly 25 per cent the total for December, 1921. Coal loadings for the month showed an increase of 46.2 per cent over December, 1921, while merchandise and miscellaneous freight increased nearly 14 per cent. This followed the heaviest November traffic in railroad history.

President Storey criticizes my reference to the rapid growth of the Santa Fe's surplus, saying I did not say "this surplus was not cash, but had been put into enlargements and into additional lines of equipment."

What I did say was that the Santa Fe in 1921 put $4,000,000 more out of that year's earnings into maintenance of the system and its equipment than was actually spent in operating the road, and still had earnings after deducting all charges, taxes, and interest, of 13 per cent on the common stock. I also said that in seven or eight years the Santa Fe had trebled its surplus, after regular dividend payments, notwithstanding its prodigious expenditures for upkeep. For 1922 it looks as if the Santa Fe will have put $100,000,000 out of earnings into upkeep alone, besides paying its dividends and adding a neat sum to its surplus.

Mr. President, since Mr. Storey is disposed to take exception to my previous remarks about excessive maintenance expenditures by his road, a splendid system, one of the best equipped and most efficiently managed railways in the country, let us examine briefly these maintenance charges. The facts I present are taken from the records of the Interstate Commerce Commission and from the records of the Public Utilities Commission of the State of Kansas. Mr. Storey nor any railway advocate or apologist can impugn the record obtained by these public fact-finding agencies. These commissions have but two sources of information. These are railroad records and books of account and the testimony of railway officials. During the first nine months of 1922 the Santa Fe spent 53.48 per cent of its entire total operating expense on maintenance. In the like period of the years 1914, 1915, 1916, and 1917 it spent 47.35 per cent on maintenance. The Santa Fe is and was at all times during the period under review one of the best managed and efficiently operated systems in the country. The conclusion is logical that this increase in maintenance is a cover for excessive earnings. The Santa Fe frankly says it has no intention of paying the Government a cent of these excess profits. It says that the part of the Cummins-Esch Act which requires such payment is unconstitutional. The provision of the act which enables the roads to mulct the farmer and the shipper of excessive toll that make these excess profits possible is, of course, entirely constitutional—good law, and above all else good business—for the railroads. These maintenance figures showing the increase in such charges by Mr. Storey's road lead to the conclusion that the Santa Fe is determined to play safe and defeat a possible court decision upholding the provision of the Cummins-Esch Act that requires payment to the Government of half the excess above the fair-return standard. It plays safe by charging these excesses to maintenance. In an illuminating address on January 11 before the Kansas State Board of Agriculture, Clyde M. Reed, chairman of the Kansas Public Utilities Commission, discussing the need of reduced transportation charges and particularly this question of maintenance, confirmed everything I have claimed as to the increased earnings of the carriers and the conditions which justify a material reduction in rates. He said:

The most prominent example of abnormal and extraordinary, not to say unreasonable and extravagant, maintenance expenditures among the western roads was on the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe. During the first nine months of 1922 the Santa Fe spent 53.48 per cent of the total operating expenses on maintenance, as compared with 42.82 per cent during the same period in 1921, and as compared with 47.35 per cent during the years 1914, 1915, 1916, and 1917. The Santa Fe has been for many years a well-managed and well-maintained railroad. The simple fact is that at this time its earnings are so great that it is hiding them in every conceivable manner as against the danger of possible recapture by the Government under the provisions of the Esch-Cummins bill. The Santa Fe Railway very frankly states that it has no intention of giving in any portion of its earnings to the Government. There is no secret made of its intention. It believes and claims that that provision of the law is unconstitutional. Of course, all of the provisions which are in its favor are constitutional. This provision happens to be in favor of the public, and measures in favor of the public are more frequently "unconstitutional" than those which are not. The Santa Fe, however, is taking no chances. When the Government finally gets around to trying out the question of excess earnings there "won't be no excess earnings" on the Santa Fe any more than there was to be a core in the little boy's apple.

This is not a new experience for the Santa Fe Railroad. In 1920 it charged $11,000,000 more against operating expenses for "maintenance" than it spent. The 1920 figures, month by month, as represented by the Santa Fe Railroad to the Interstate Commerce Commission were as follows:

January	$1,678,004	July	$2,638,157
February	1,996,378	August	9,846,123
March	2,743,980	September	3,795,041
April	2,682,650	October	3,795,040
May	2,715,320	November	3,795,040
June	2,700,185	December	3,795,041

One has only to look at those figures to understand that something is wrong. When you bear in mind that August, 1920, was the last month of the Government guaranty, and this was not a so-called but an actual guaranty, the motive of the railroad becomes apparent.

It may be in accordance with railroad ethics to make such outrageous charges under a Government guaranty, but it leaves the impression upon the average citizen that something is radically wrong.

Some of the roads, Mr. President, are spending so much for improvements that the charge is made they are "silver plating" their properties. For instance, the Union Pacific spent $45,000,000 last year and will spend $20,000,000 this year for equipment and improvements alone. This year 27 roads are to spend more than $350,000,000 on these two items. The New York Central will expend $83,000,000.

Mr. President, I am not criticizing such expenditures. The point is simply this, that whether these large earnings are put back into the system or invested in securities or deposited in cash they are earnings none the less, and they are excessive earnings. If the surplus is invested in "enlargements and additional lines and equipment," the surplus then participates in producing still more earnings.

Not a dollar of these excess earnings above the 6 per cent fair-return standard, netted by probably 60 railway systems under the rate clause of the Cummins-Esch law, has been paid to the Government. This law expressly provides that half of the excess above 6 per cent must be paid into the Federal Treasury for the benefit of the weaker roads.

Commenting on that part of my remarks in which I specifically mentioned a number of roads that were handsomely exceeding their dividend requirements, the New York Herald says the roads have not earned even 4 per cent under the so-called guaranty.

The Herald refers to the earnings of all the roads, which under the valuation fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission show a net return of 4.05 for the old year. The commission itself says that 40 railroads have reported earnings in excess of the 6 per cent fair-return standard, and intimates when actual valuation of all the roads is arrived at the number may be larger. The commission also says that not one of the 40 big roads, nor a number of the smaller roads whose earnings are in excess of the fair-return standard, have paid any of this surplus to the Government. This is required by the law to equalize the returns of the poorer roads.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CAPPER. I do.

Mr. SMITH. Has the Senator a tabulation showing the total mileage of the 40 roads which have earned in excess of the 6 per cent?

Mr. CAPPER. No; I have not that information, I will say to the Senator from South Carolina. The Interstate Commerce Commission submitted to the Senate about two weeks ago a very interesting report as to the excess earnings of the railroads and the failure of the carriers, even though it is three years since that provision of the law became effective, to make any return to the Government under the fair-return standard.

Mr. SMITH. I have not seen the report to which the Senator refers. Does it give the names of the roads that have made excess earnings?

Mr. CAPPER. It does. The report has been printed as a Senate document, and the Senator from South Carolina will find it exceedingly illuminating upon this subject.

Mr. SMITH. I am sorry the Senator did not incorporate at the point where he has discussed the subject the total per cent of railroad mileage operated by the 40 roads which have earned in excess of 6 per cent. Those who have the privilege of reading his remarks naturally will want to know what per cent of the total railroad mileage in this country was earning that rate.

Mr. CAPPER. The trouble is the Interstate Commerce Commission made a report only as to those roads for which it has completed the valuation figures. The other information is still to be obtained. It states, however, that there are at least 40 roads which have earned in excess of 6 per cent and have failed to make return to the Government.

Mr. SMITH. I do not recall the exact provision of the law, and will ask the Senator whether it requires that the valuation of the roads shall be completed before the estimate of earnings shall be made public?

Mr. CAPPER. The law says that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall take into consideration the valuation fixed by that body.

Mr. SMITH. I thought, perhaps, that was true, and that would cause some delay in the case of some roads the valuation of which has not as yet been completed by the commission. I believe the Senator said that the Interstate Commerce Commission indicates that it may appear that other roads, in addition to the 40 reported, have also exceeded the 6 per cent?

Mr. CAPPER. The report of the commission does indicate that fact. It is but a partial showing. None the less it serves conclusively to sustain my contention that freight rates are excessive and can be reduced in the larger interest of the roads themselves and the country at large, and the great agricultural industry in particular. The commission reported only on roads which it has tentatively valued under the valuation act. Among these it makes plain that 40 roads have made earnings in excess of the fair-return standard. Of these but 12 are class 1 roads. These 12, according to the commission's report, show excess earnings of more than $15,000,000. The really big roads of the country, Mr. President, are not included in the report. The amount due the Government will be increased many times when we get the reports of the big roads, like the Santa Fe, the Burlington, the Union Pacific, and the Lackawanna.

This is a frank confession that the farmers of the great productive regions of the United States, taking into consideration the prices received by them, are heavily overcharged for transportation. It is an admission that the entire agricultural, prosperity making area of this country is under the blight of excessive and, in many cases, prohibitive freight rates. These regions are compelled to pay this excessive toll to overpaid, highly prosperous railway systems, so that the much less important, poorly conducted, or inefficiently managed roads may be sustained in their inefficiency.

Some few of the smaller roads have paid a paltry $42,000 into the Treasury under this clause of the act. These payments came from some of the smaller roads, roads which apparently are not equipped with legal departments to tell them this part of the law is unconstitutional. In the main this provision of the law is openly violated and nothing is done about it.

The repeal of section 15a of the Cummins-Esch Act, says another one of my newspaper critics, would remove the limitation of railroad profits. We have just seen how this section of the transportation act utterly fails to limit profits and how completely it works to an exactly opposite end.

Mr. President, the vice of section 15a lies in the fact that it attempts to provide a fixed return to be earned upon the aggregate value of all railroad properties, good, bad, and indifferent. Virtually this valuation is based upon the present cost of reproducing the lines. The result is that no matter how worthless a road may be, it is considered entitled to earn 5½ per cent on what it would now cost to rebuild it. For example, the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic, now passing through its second receivership in less than 10 years, can not earn its operating expenses; but the Interstate Commerce Commission announces a tentative valuation of $25,000,000 for this road. Under section 15a that $25,000,000 is added to the valuation on which the public must pay a return in the shape of freight rates. This means that all the southern roads in that rate group are permitted to charge rates based on their own value, plus the $25,000,000 valuation put on this worthless road.

This road was built, as many other such roads were built, for speculation and stock jobbing. So that these worthless roads may earn what they never have been able to earn and never will be able to earn, the Interstate Commerce Commission in several instances has refused the requests of prosperous roads to lower their rates.

The railways are entitled to credit for economies they have effected during the past year or two, but still further saving can be made. Reports to the Interstate Commerce Commission show that five railroad executives are receiving a combined salary of $424,670, or an average of $84,934 each per year. I believe these salaries are too high.

Depriving the State railway commissions of virtually all control over State rates has led to increasing State rates which already were giving a State's carriers an ample return to a higher figure, so that they might earn dividends for several lame-duck, stock-jobbed roads in another State.

In most instances these "lame-duck" roads are notorious for their financial failure. In some cases they were originally built to serve some mining or lumbering areas, and the mines have been worked out and the regions denuded of saw timber, and the traffic now originating in the territory served is inadequate to provide profitable operation of the roads. To care for these roads the rest of the country must endure rate extortion. Then, as we have seen, these strong, profitable carriers refuse to give any part of these surplus earnings to the Government for the support of these "lame-duck" roads.

This rate-making farce is proving costly to the country. It places an embargo on free movement of the products of the Nation's greatest producing industry. Thousands upon thousands of acres of crops have rotted, instead of being added to and increasing the country's prosperity. Neither can an Interstate Commerce Commission immured in Washington, and completely out of touch with State and local conditions, by any possibility act promptly or fairly on the innumerable rate problems constantly arising in 48 States. It is swamped with work at this moment, with no possibility of adjudicating a hundredth part of the transportation questions continually arising.

Mr. President, section 15a of the Cummins-Esch Act has proved a dangerous and impossible makeshift. The sooner we repeal it and give State railroad commissions more control over intrastate rates and coordinate power to adjust such rates fairly, the better it will be for the roads and for the country. It will end most of these excessive rates and make possible the return of prosperity.

RURAL-CREDIT FACILITIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4287) to provide credit facilities for the agricultural and live-stock industries of the United States; to amend the Federal farm loan act; to amend the Federal reserve act; and for other purposes.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 7, line 20, after the word "increased," it is proposed to strike out "by an amount not to exceed $5,000,000"; and on page 8, line 2, after the word "capital," it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That the subscriptions to such additional capital on behalf of the United States shall at no time exceed in the aggregate to all said banks $60,000,000, and no farm-loan bank shall receive an increase in capital of more than $10,000,000.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the purpose sought to be accomplished by this amendment is this:

Under the pending bill, $5,000,000 capital is required for each bank. That is made imperative. Then there is an additional fund of $5,000,000 which under certain conditions can be subscribed to its capital stock. That additional $5,000,000 will not be needed in some sections. I doubt whether in four or five of the sections the increase will be asked for. This amendment is to allow the money to be subscribed in the sections of the country where it is needed for agricultural purposes, and the amendment would permit the banks in some of the districts in the agricultural sections of the West and South to have a capital stock of $15,000,000 out of this fund.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the Senator provides in his amendment that out of this practical reserve fund, as we may call it, a bank, instead of having a maximum of $10,000,000 capital stock, as the law now provides, may in an emergency go as high as $15,000,000?

Mr. SWANSON. That is correct. I understand that the junior Senator from Wisconsin is willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes, Mr. President. As I understand the amendment, it leaves the maximum increased subscription exactly as it is in the bill; but under the bill no single bank could receive an increase of more than $5,000,000. The effect of this amendment is to make the total possible capitalization of a land bank $15,000,000, in the discretion of the Farm Loan Board and the President of the United States; but in no event can the total subscription exceed the amount now named in the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. That is true. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, did the Senator from Wisconsin exactly state the case?

Mr. LENROOT. As I understood it, I have. If I have been misinformed, I may not have done so.

Mr. GLASS. As I understand, the bill as reported authorizes an increase in the capital of these divisions of the land banks aggregating $60,000,000, which is apportioned in the bill $5,000,000 to each bank. The amendment proposed by my colleague is designed to mobilize the entire $60,000,000, so that as much as $10,000,000 in addition to the original capital may be apportioned to any one of these banks which requires that fund for its purposes.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true; but the entire $60,000,000 additional does not need to be subscribed at all.

Mr. GLASS. No. It may be, for example, that a land bank at Springfield, Mass., would not need a dollar of the fund, and that a land bank somewhere else in the agricultural districts of the country would need, say, $10,000,000 additional; so that the bank where the need is greatest might get this $10,000,000 in addition to its $5,000,000 of capital, making $15,000,000.

Mr. LENROOT. So I understand it. That is the way I thought I stated it.

Mr. SWANSON. That is what the amendment accomplishes. I understand that the Senator accepts it.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; I have no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I shall not ask for a vote on these amendments this afternoon; but I offer the amendments which I send to the desk, one to the present Federal reserve act, to be incorporated in this bill—it is an amendment to this bill, and the place is indicated—and also an amendment to the text of the present bill, in the last paragraph. I ask that they be printed and lie on the table, because I want to take them up, if possible, when we come to vote on the amendments, as I presume we will do to-morrow, and repeat what I said in my talk of yesterday. I think it is a mere gesture to talk about nine months, because, if it is necessary to have a pole 10 feet long to knock down a persimmon, an 8-foot pole is just as ineffectual as a 1-foot pole would be. If you do not get the persimmon, you have no use for the pole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will be printed and lie on the table.

WAR DEBT OF GREAT BRITAIN TO THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this morning for the first time, I believe, an exact statement was published as to the proposed terms of the debt-funding transaction:

First. Interest on the debt from the time the loans were made in 1917 up to the present time to be reduced from 5 to 4½ per cent, the minimum rate prescribed under the debt-funding act.

Second. Interest on the principal and accrued interest due at this time for the first 10 years shall be 3 per cent and thereafter 3½ per cent until the debt is liquidated.

Third. Interest shall be paid each year as it accrues on the full amount of the debt remaining due.

Fourth. Annual payments shall be made on the principal, beginning at $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 a year and increasing in amount every three to five years, so that the entire debt will be liquidated in 60 years.

Mr. President, assuming that this debt is $4,700,000,000, as is commonly reported—and it is about that amount—it will be remembered that we now hold obligations of Great Britain for the entire indebtedness, bearing 5 per cent interest. Mr. Baldwin on his return home said that this was a double-riveted obligation, or words to that effect. The interest on that at 5 per cent, by a simple calculation, is $235,000,000 per year. The Congress has already made a proposition—and, by the way, it is the only proposition that has been made or could be made—permitting its reduction from 5 per cent to 4½ per cent, which is giving to Great Britain $35,250,000 a year, assuming the debt to run without payments on account of the principal.

That is absolutely right and fair, because in our original contract with Great Britain we agreed that the interest rate to be charged Great Britain would be exactly the same interest rate this Government had to pay for the money it borrowed; and of course no fault can be found with reducing it to 4½ per cent, the average amount we have to pay. Congress has done that, and this is the only proposal Congress has made.

I now call attention to the fact that the yearly interest rate on the entire indebtedness, at 4½ per cent, is $199,750,000 per year. At 3½ per cent, after the 10 years, it amounts to $164,500,000 a year. Assuming that the principal debt runs along, therefore, we will be taxing the American people, after 10 years, $35,250,000 a year for the benefit of Great Britain if this proposal goes through. For the first 10 years, when the debt bears only 3 per cent, it brings $141,000,000, and therefore we are taxing the American people during the first 10 years the sum of $58,750,000 a year for the benefit of Great Britain. In other words, we are to-day paying, on this identical indebtedness, $199,750,000, and during the first 10 years we will receive from Great Britain only $141,000,000 per year on it, a difference of $58,750,000 per year against the United States.

I want to know whether we, as representatives of the American people, have the right to give this bonus, to give this annual subsidy, to Great Britain, assuming that the principal is not paid—and anyone can see that the proposal in that regard is exceedingly indefinite—and whether we ought to tax the American people to the extent of $58,750,000 a year for the next 10 years for that purpose. Then I want to know whether we ought to tax the American people after that time to the extent of $35,250,000 a year for the remaining 52 years for the benefit of Great Britain, and especially when we now have a contract with them providing for 5 per cent interest and when we agreed in the act under which we borrowed this money that Great Britain should pay an average of 4½ per cent interest, that being the average rate at which we borrowed. I am assuming all along that the principal debt will not be paid in the meantime.

There is a suggestion in the fourth paragraph of this proposed settlement that some of the principal will be paid as time goes on; but assuming that none is paid and that the bonds run 62 years, we will be taxing the American people during that entire period in these enormous sums—$58,750,000 a year for the first 10 years, and thereafter $35,250,000 a year for the remainder of the period—in order to make up the difference between what we pay and what is received from Great Britain. Of course, if payments are made on the principal, the interest payments will be proportionately reduced.

We went to war and won our independence on taxation far less onerous than that. We are not represented in the British Parliament, but under this agreement we are indirectly allowing the British Government to tax the American people in these enormous sums yearly, and I say taxing them, because everybody knows that the obligations we hold from Great Britain to-day are absolutely good. They are as good as wheat, as good as any nation's obligation. British bonds are selling around par, and there is no reason why this debt can not be collected in the future, and it will be collected.

As I said before, I have no desire whatever that we should collect any greater rate than that we originally agreed to charge Great Britain for the money. In the act of Congress under which we loaned the money to her we agreed that we would not ask more than we had to pay for it ourselves. Surely she can not object to that. We have been liberal with her in reducing it $35,350,000 a year, namely, from 5 per cent to 4½ per cent, even after she has given us 5 per cent paper. Some say she is not able to pay it. Of course, we all know she is. Some say that this is a good settlement. If she is going to back out of a 5 per cent interest rate, and if she is not willing to pay 4½ per cent, how do we know she is going to pay the 3 per cent when the time rolls around, or 3½ per cent? If she repudiates a part of it, do we not know that if she has an opportunity she will repudiate more than that? I do not believe she will repudiate any of it.

It is said over in Great Britain that our commission made this proposition. Our commission had no such authority. They went into that conference under terms of an act of Congress. They knew exactly that they had to remain within those terms in order to reach a settlement, and they had no authority to make such a proposition as this, and no authority but this Congress has the right to make any proposition. The only proposition that has been made to Great Britain is the proposition made by Congress itself, and that is to fix the rate of interest at 4½ per cent, just exactly what we pay for the money.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not want to enter into a discussion of that proposition, whatever it may be, although I think the Senator will find that the commission has never made any proposition—

Mr. McKELLAR. I sincerely hope our commission did not make that proposition. As the Senator knows, I have been trying day after day to get a statement from the commission as to what they have done. If they have not made this proposition, they ought to tell the American people that they have not made it. I hope they have not made it. They should not have made it. My judgment is that it came from Great Britain. But the American people have a right to know. Our five commissioners are not dumb men. They are all able to express themselves. They all know what took place there, and I think they ought to come forward and give us the facts about it. There has been too much secrecy in the negotiations.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator of course knows that nothing can be done without action by Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course.

Mr. LENROOT. And the Senator of course knows that when the matter comes to Congress full information will come with it, and does not the Senator think that will be the time to discuss that part of it?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I do not for this reason: That propaganda is being spread around now; propaganda went out from this city last night that the Congress was going to agree to this proposed settlement. I do not know whether the Congress is going to agree to this proposed settlement or not. I think it will be some time before this Congress will agree to any such settlement.

Mr. LENROOT. That was not what I wished to interrupt for. I wanted to ask the Senator whether he would make the same demands upon France and upon Belgium and upon the other countries of Europe?

Mr. McKELLAR. Indeed, I think the settlements ought to be precisely the same for all nations borrowing from us.

Mr. LENROOT. How does the Senator propose to enforce the collection of the claims against those countries?

Mr. McKELLAR. We can not enforce collection, but Great Britain will certainly pay.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator say that because he thinks Great Britain is more honorable than the other nations?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; Great Britain is able to pay now, and has so stated time and again.

Mr. LENROOT. Then does the Senator think that neither France nor any other country is able to pay anything?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am inclined to think they are able to pay and will pay. I make no distinction between our former allies. We ought to make exactly the same terms with France and Belgium and the other countries that we make with Great Britain; but the indebtedness of Great Britain is more important, because the settlement is imminent as between us and Great Britain, and in addition to that, Great Britain is now paying the interest on her indebtedness.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator then take the position, with reference to the other countries of Europe, that he would prefer to make a demand of 4½ per cent and get nothing or adjust the difference and get money?

Mr. McKELLAR. There is no question about that at all, for the reason that their obligations to us now bear 5 per cent, and they are paying it.

Mr. LENROOT. What countries are paying 5 per cent?

Mr. McKELLAR. Great Britain.

Mr. LENROOT. What other countries?

Mr. McKELLAR. None; but it does not make any difference about the settlements of the others; Great Britain is paying hers.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, the Senator thinks no other countries can pay anything?

Mr. McKELLAR. I imagine that other countries can do it.

Mr. LENROOT. Why are they not doing it?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know. The Senator is just as able to explain that as I am. I do not know whether they have been requested. I understand our present administration, of which the Senator is part, has never made a request on any other Government for payment.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator well understands that it was the previous administration which gave them three years' time without the payment of any interest, does he not?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know that. That has been a matter in dispute, and I do not know whether it is so or not. It should not have done it if it did. I will join the Senator on that proposition. In this connection, I want to read a statement that has just been given out, so the newspaper men tell me, by the British Embassy. I read it as it was handed to me:

The British Embassy requests publicity for the following statement with regard to the interview reported in the press as having been granted by Mr. Stanley Baldwin, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, at Southampton on his arrival there last week:

Telegraphic inquiries made by this embassy in London show "that Mr. Baldwin did not grant any interview to any representative of the press."

"On arrival he was surrounded, however, by ten or a dozen reporters, who asked innumerable questions, to some of which Mr. Baldwin replied informally. The impression which his answers created in the mind of the editor of an important London daily newspaper is indicated by the following editorial comment:

"The Chancellor of the Exchequer has made a statement to the press about his debt-funding mission to the United States. We do not disagree with his argument, although it makes him look more like an American emissary than a British chancellor. If he would do as much to explain the British position to America as he is doing to explain the American position to Britain he might then be a useful public servant."

"The remarks attributed to Mr. Baldwin in certain organs of the American press—that the debt had got on the nerves of the American people and that Congress would not be willing to eat its own legislation—are without discoverable foundation."

"Mr. Baldwin neither criticized nor aspersed any section of the American people. On the contrary, he sought to express his great appreciation of the kindness and courtesy which were extended to him throughout his recent visit to this country."

I have read the statement. If any public man talks to newspaper reporters on one of the most important subjects in all the world to-day and does not know that he is giving out a statement, that man needs psychiatric attention. I see no difference between giving out a statement calling Americans of the West "hog raisers" and "ignorant of international debt questions," and calling all western Senators "politicians," and saying the same thing informally. It is worse to say it informally, because it conveys just what the speaker really thinks. No doubt now Mr. Baldwin wishes he had given out a "statement," and in such "statement" concealed his real views. The explanation merely emphasizes the original statement given out by Mr. Baldwin. So much for that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was going to ask the Senator earlier in his remarks whether he understood that the average rate of interest to be paid on the United States debt would be 4½ per cent until the maturity of the debt.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is, as fixed by Congress?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; will the average rate of interest paid on the bonds of the American Government run about 4½ per cent for the entire period?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator wants to know whether, in future funding transactions, it may not be possible for the American Government to fund its present obligations, which average 4½ per cent, at a lower rate of interest. Is that the question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That was one of the first questions I had to ask.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to say this in answer to that: That if we are able to do it, we should at the same time, in the same measure, reduce the rate of interest on the British obligations. We ought to be absolutely fair to our British friends. We ought to see to it that they get the money on exactly the same terms the American Government gets it, and I for one would be willing to have a provision in the contract to the effect that whenever at any time this Government is enabled to fund its bonds at a lower rate of interest, the British Government should have the advantage of that lower rate of interest on the bonds given us.

I am glad the Senator asked the question, because I had intended to say that in the course of what I have had to say this afternoon about the matter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is our average rate of interest to-day 4½ per cent?

Mr. McKELLAR. I only say that I have had it so stated to me by a number of men in whom I have great confidence. My distinct recollection is that the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot], who is an expert in such matters, told me that the average rate of interest was 4½ per cent and that was the reason why it was fixed at that amount in the act.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. Glass] could no doubt tell us.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have not given the matter my personal attention, but my recollection is that a very large part of the bonded indebtedness of the United States Government brings 3½ per cent interest, and how the general average could be 4½ per cent passes my comprehension.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will remember that nearly a billion dollars of the $4,700,000,000 was loaned to Great Britain after the war was over. It came in part from Victory bonds, as I recall. I think they have been refunded now, but taking the entire bonded debt from which we secured the money, part of it was gotten at 3½ per cent, part at 3¾ per cent, part at 4 per cent, part at 4½ per cent, I think a part at 4¾ per cent, and a part at 4½ per cent. I think some of the Victory obligations were even as high as 4½ per cent. I will not be positive about it, but I am positive about the fact that the bonded indebtedness caused by the war ran from 3½ per cent minimum to 4½ per cent maximum.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not mean to interrupt the Senator unduly, but I think he will have to revise his figures on the average rate of interest, and they will be revised downward.

Mr. McKELLAR. If that is correct, Great Britain ought to have the advantage of it. She ought not to be charged one sou more than the amount which the money costs the American people. But my proposition is that the American people ought not to be taxed an additional sum to pay the difference between the rates that we have to pay and that which Great Britain has to pay.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator for a question, but I am anxious to get through.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have no question to ask. I simply wanted to state my recollection of the rate of interest which our obligations bear.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do it. I have not looked it up. I am taking the newspaper statements made about it and the statement made to me by the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot], who is very accurate about such matters.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The first liberty bonds issued were tax exempt and they were floated at 3½ per cent. The next Liberty loan bore 4½ per cent with the privilege that if the Government should at a subsequent period issue bonds bearing a higher rate of interest, the purchasers of the second Liberty loan should have the right to exchange them, and most of the second Liberty loan bonds have been exchanged for 4½ per cent bonds. I think there is no doubt that the rate of interest may well be said to be not less than 4½ per cent now, with the exception of the first Liberty loan, which is tax exempt and which bears 3½ per cent.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am quite confident in my own mind that the Senator from New Mexico is correct about it. But it is easily ascertainable and whatever the amount may be, whether it is 4 or less than 4 or more than 4 per cent, we ought to see to it that Great Britain pays us no more and no less than the amount the American Government had to pay.

Lest we forget, Mr. President, I want to quote from a recent political work written by a newspaper reporter here in Washington, by the name of Arthur Wallace Dunn. The book is in two volumes and is called "From Harrison to Harding." Mr. Dunn is evidently a Republican, and he writes from the Republican viewpoint, but it is a most delightful and entertaining book. If Senators have not read it, I suggest to them that they will pass some very pleasant and profitable hours if they will read Mr. Dunn's book in connection with the history of the recent affairs in this country. They will hardly be able to lay it down after they have started to read it.

I want to quote from pages 277 to 279 of Mr. Dunn's book very briefly, reflecting light on the particular subject as to whether we are doing the right thing by Great Britain:

About the middle of June, 1915—

Wrote Mr. Dunn—

our people learned that Great Britain had been making use of our commerce had been detained. We had been restricted from dealing with neutral countries in noncontraband articles. By orders in council Great Britain was making or unmaking international law as best suited her designs. Goods which United States merchants were not permitted to deliver in Holland, Sweden, and Denmark were sent from Great Britain, and British merchants were making large profits.

Besides rifling our mails Great Britain had been making use of our flag, hoisting it over merchant ships in order to deceive enemy ships and thus escape capture or destruction. The seizure of American ships and their detention, while mails, not only to Germany but neutral nations as well, were opened and their contents disclosed became a regular practice. American merchants began to complain that their trade secrets were thus obtained and that their customers were being taken away and turned over to British merchants. By July 18, 1915, it was shown that more than 2,000 American ships had been seized and taken into British ports.

Notes of protest were sent on several occasions, but in every case, whether concerning the seizure of ships or concerning the mails, Great Britain rejected the demands of the United States and maintained that all her acts were a war necessity.

"Dollar chasers."

Just like they are now hissing the American flag in the theaters in London, just like they are now calling Americans "money sharks" because we are not willing to reduce the rate of interest to less than Great Britain has ever paid in her history and less than was ever paid in the history of any nation in the time of war.

Dollar chasers was what Americans were called in the British and Canadian press, because objection was made to the interference with the neutral rights of American citizens engaged in legitimate commerce. Every act which was against Germany was loudly applauded and every demand upon England was denounced.

By the middle of September American cargoes valued at $15,000,000 had been confiscated. Meanwhile Great Britain was successfully floating a loan in this country and raising $500,000,000 to pay for the war supplies furnished by citizens of the United States.

The manner in which Great Britain outraged our commercial rights was notorious. She stopped our ships and confiscated their cargoes; she blacklisted our business men and arrogantly supervised our trade with the world, particularly in South America. Altogether it seemed that our grievances against Great Britain were almost as great as those against Germany, but while the English captured and confiscated American property the Germans destroyed not only American property but also American lives.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator believe all that? The Senator has advised other Senators to read the book. It all has a very familiar tone. It is the exact language and the exact kind of sermon that was preached to the United States by every pro-German. It is the same old story. The thing was hashed out time and time again.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator deny that Great Britain did any such thing?

Mr. WADSWORTH. To no such extent as described in that book.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator deny that Great Britain took thousands of our ships?

Mr. WADSWORTH. To no such extent as described in that book. The confiscation did not occur.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am giving what is in the book.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator is giving what the man Dunn said, and that is an old story.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is a historical volume. Of course, I do not vouch for its accuracy. I merely submit it to the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I advise Mr. Dunn and the Senator from Tennessee to read the letters of Mr. Page, late ambassador to London, on that very point.

Mr. McKELLAR. It looks sometimes as if when our ambassadors get to London they rapidly become more British than they are American. I refer especially to the present ambassador. I think his views are to-day largely more British than they are American.

Mr. GLASS. May I inquire of the Senator from Tennessee whether he is under the impression that Great Britain is going to repudiate her indebtedness to the United States?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not the slightest idea Great Britain will repudiate her debt. What I am asking is that the American Congress shall not tax the American people to pay a portion of the interest on the debt of Great Britain.

Mr. GLASS. If the American Congress should conclude to do that, which I do not think the American Congress will do, does that form any basis for a rather severe, if not savage, attack upon Great Britain?

Mr. McKELLAR. I say that when it comes to the statements that are being publicly made that this Congress is going to ratify before the 4th of March, without proper deliberation and consideration, as it seems to me, a proposal that we do not yet know whence it came or whether it came from Great Britain or from our own commission, a proposal wholly beyond the proposal that was made by Congress by act duly passed—when I see statements like that coming out in the press of the country, propaganda everywhere that the American people ought to tax themselves somewhere between $35,000,000 and $68,000,000 a year rather indefinitely to pay difference in interest charged, I think it is time for somebody to speak up for American rights.

Mr. GLASS. If the Congress should do that, and any criticism might properly lie against that process, it seems to me the criticism should be directed at Congress and not against Great Britain.

Mr. McKELLAR. Congress has not yet done that thing.

Mr. GLASS. Therefore, I wonder why the Senator should make a savage attack on Great Britain.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have made no savage attack on Great Britain. I have spoken about this matter for the reason that the emissary from Great Britain to this country has made a most savage attack upon this body and the Members of it.

Mr. GLASS. I do not so construe what he said. I think what he said might have been more diplomatically said, but I do not think it might have been more truthfully said.

Mr. McKELLAR. It was very much more savage than anything I have said. What I have said is backed up by reports given to the press from time to time and by what we all know to be the facts. I believe Baldwin's statement wholly incorrect.

Mr. GLASS. When it comes to casting up accounts and contrasting matters of indebtedness, I feel that there is a good deal to be said on the other side of the question. I had two boys on the firing lines in France, and I can not exactly repress a feeling of indebtedness to Great Britain that she buried about 1,500,000 of her sons to save the lives of my boys and other American boys. In short, the British fought three years for civilization before we took our place beside them in identically the same cause.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Of course, the Senator has informed himself on the transaction. Does he know whether the present rate of interest, which is 5 per cent, as I believe he stated, is added to the principal in the negotiations?

Mr. McKELLAR. My understanding is that the accrued interest is to be calculated and added at the rate of 4½ per cent in the proposal.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Under the present obligation?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; instead of the present obligation, which bears 5 per cent. They are going to calculate the present principal with interest at 4½ per cent up to the date of settlement and add that to the principal.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator understands, does he not, that this, of course, would be subject to the approval of Congress?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Congress will have the final say?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; and that is exactly why I am drawing it to the attention of Congress now. I do not think that Congress ought to permit the proposed settlement or any settlement such as we have understood would be made to be effected.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is to be brought before Congress for final settlement in proper manner, is it not?

Mr. McKELLAR. I suppose so. The Senator from New Jersey may be on the inside and he can give us some information.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am not on the inside.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Debt Funding Commission has been in existence for some time; it has been engaged in attempting to fund this indebtedness for some time. I have tried in every way possible to get some expression from the commission as to what has been going on, but they have made no statement. So I do not know what the commission has done. The only news that we get about the settlement comes from London.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am not on the inside; but the Senator from Tennessee professes to know all about this transaction. He has stated that England intends to repudiate some part of her debt. Does the Senator believe that England in the proposition submitted intends to repudiate or has repudiated any of her just debts? She has honorably come here trying to settle them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator misunderstood me entirely. He did not hear me say anything of the kind.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator did not say that?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am very glad to hear the Senator's denial.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from New Jersey is merely mistaken about my having said anything of the kind. I said that I believed Great Britain would settle her indebtedness. She is a debt-paying nation; she can not continue to be the great nation she is unless she continues to pay her debts, and she will pay them. I have, however, said that Congress has already, of its own motion, remitted three-fourths of 1 per cent from the obligations which we held—$35,250,000 a year on the debt as it stands.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think if the Senator from Tennessee will review what he has said he will find that he did state that England would repudiate her just indebtedness, or was trying to do so.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, if I said that, I must have been dreaming, and I am not dreaming about this matter. If I find I have made such a statement I certainly shall make the correction, and I will let the Senator know about it, because I never intended to make any such statement.

I have since examined the stenographer's report and find I made no such statement. Indeed, I said exactly the contrary.

I do not believe that Great Britain intends to repudiate her indebtedness, but I think she is trying to make the best trade possible, and if she can get the American Congress to assume a part of her obligations and to devote the sum of $58,750,000 a year for 10 years and $35,250,000 a year for 52 years to aid her in paying off her indebtedness, of course she is going to do it. It would be to her interest to do it, for she wants to make the best trade she can.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, does the Senator from Tennessee think it would be exactly fair savagely to assail Great Britain if the Congress should do that? What evil thing has Great Britain done to provoke this bitter criticism? She has not sought to escape the payment of a dollar of her honorable indebtedness to this Nation. She has held her head high in peace, just as she carried her arms gallantly in triumph in war. I do not appreciate or relish these constant attacks upon the people who were in concert with us against a common enemy.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, I am sorry that the Senator can not relish them, but that is not my fault, one way or the other. What I am trying to do is to give the American view of it.

Mr. GLASS. As I think, Mr. President, the Senator is not giving the American view of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think I am. I know I am. I know no other view than the American view.

Mr. GLASS. I think the Senator is presenting a view that is hostile to the people with whom we fought the war in concert.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, Mr. President, remarks like that are unworthy of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator is savagely assailing Great Britain merely because he apprehends that the Congress of the United States may cancel a part of the interest charge against that nation. Great Britain is no suppliant; she has not asked Congress to cancel anything. Great Britain is going to pay her indebtedness in dollars, just as she paid her obligation in blood for the cause which we assume at one time to be our cause, but which now we seem to have forgotten.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; we have not forgotten anything of the kind. Of course, it is unworthy of the Senator from Virginia to talk about my expressions being pro-German or my being pro-German. The Senator knows that I have no pro-German feeling of any kind and never have had. The Senator understands that, I am sure, and I regret that he was willing to make any such statement.

Mr. GLASS. Of course, I know the Senator from Tennessee has not been pro-German; the more am I distressed that he now has been betrayed into unfriendly criticism of our former ally in the war. What has Great Britain done to invite this sort of comment?

Mr. McKELLAR. Great Britain has sent a commission—

Mr. GLASS. From the first she has stated her purpose to pay her indebtedness to the United States. Of course, she has sent a commission here to make as reasonable terms as may be made. Is there any offense in that? The commission came at our invitation. And is the Senator going to blame Britain if the Congress of the United States shall make terms more reasonable than the Senator from Tennessee thinks ought to be made?

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me ask the Senator a question.

Mr. GLASS. It seems to me the criticism ought to be directed against the Congress of the United States and not against Great Britain.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me ask the Senator this question: Under the Senator's administration of the Treasury Department, did he not take the obligations of Great Britain at 5 per cent?

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Do not the very obligations which the Senator as Secretary of the Treasury took measure the indebtedness of Great Britain to us?

Now, when she sends a commission over to us to secure better terms than those which her obligations already allow, why is not that seeking to get out of paying in part her indebtedness to this country?

Mr. GLASS. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, the moral obligation of Great Britain to this country under the text of the Liberty loan acts was to pay us no higher rate of interest than the charge at which we floated our indebtedness from the proceeds of which we made this loan; and the Senator himself has said that the Congress of the United States has reduced that rate from 5 to 4½ per cent.

Mr. McKELLAR. In absolute accord with the act of Congress under which this money was borrowed, and that is all I maintain—I want a settlement under these acts of Congress.

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator—

Mr. McKELLAR. Just a moment. I maintain that that is the measure of the obligation of Great Britain to us, and that if Great Britain asks for a different measurement now she is asking to repudiate in part the interest which she has already agreed to pay and for which we hold her obligations.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, Great Britain is not proposing to repudiate one farthing of her indebtedness to the United States. Great Britain, following the example of the United States, designated a commission to take these matters under advisement and to reach terms of adjustment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Within certain limitations but, according to reports from London, our commission have disregarded the limitations that were fixed by Congress.

Mr. GLASS. Then why does not the Senator assail our commission instead of assailing Great Britain. The Senator has revived all the pre-war bitterness by putting in the RECORD the very pro-German stuff that was disseminated in this country to keep us from going in on the side of Britain and France and Belgium. He is reviving the talk about the "ravages of our commerce on the seas" and the interruption by Great Britain of our business activities with central Europe.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; and I know our commerce was ravaged. Everybody knows it was done. No one can deny it.

Mr. GLASS. What has that got to do with the debt question any more than the fact that our commerce was also ravaged by Germany and our women and children drowned in the seas?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President—

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In regard to England's seizure of contraband vessels, I happen to know something about it; I have some familiarity with marine insurance, and I merely wish to say that wherever England seized vessels as contraband or interfered with commerce she took those vessels into the admiralty courts; the cases were duly tried, and England, I know, has been extremely fair in her settlement where she did not seize the vessels in accord with international and admiralty law.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; but she never thought that she was doing anything that was not in accord with international and admiralty law. She absolutely disregarded our rights on the seas.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator why it is that he condemns so severely the nation that offers to adjust and pay its indebtedness and has no word of condemnation for other nations that have like obligations and that neither offer to settle or to pay?

Mr. McKELLAR. It ought to be obvious to anybody in the world. This is the only settlement just now before the American people or before the Congress. When we come to other settlements, then they may be discussed. When the Senator's administration brings before us other settlements, as it ought to do, then we will discuss those settlements.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, would the Senator be content, in the case of England, if she paid nothing and remained silent? Would he have no word of criticism then? Why does he not criticize those nations that have paid nothing?

Mr. McKELLAR. On the contrary, the Senator knows that ever since 1919 I have been vigorously and actively seeking to get some settlement with the foreign governments that owe us money. It is no new thing with me. I am just as much in favor of collecting the indebtedness due us from other nations as I am of collecting from Great Britain. They owe us money, and they ought to fund it according to the terms of Congress to pay the interest. The only difference is that the question of the British indebtedness is now before the American people and before the American Congress. Whenever a proposed settlement of the indebtedness of other nations comes before us, that will be discussed, too.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator condemns a nation because they offer to settle and pay, but the Senator has no word of condemnation of a nation that does not offer to pay a dollar on a just debt.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Republican administration announced a day or two ago that they had not asked and would not ask the other nations to pay a dollar at the present time.

Mr. LENROOT. In view of the Senator's attitude, I should like to ask him another question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. An amendment is pending, and more of them will be offered, to the bill now under consideration extending further credits to foreign governments—in one case, a maximum of $250,000,000 for the purchase of cotton and other agricultural products. In view of the Senator's attitude, I assume he is against all of those measures.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am against them, absolutely.

Mr. LENROOT. I am glad to know that.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, not only are there measures pending here proposing to loan $250,000,000 to various nations but there is a bill pending, upon which a hearing is being seriously had, to loan, not Great Britain or France or Italy, whose troops fought with our troops in the war, but to loan to Germany $1,000,000,000 of the taxpayers' money of the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; and I am just as much opposed to that, and more so, than I am opposed to any of the others. I am opposed to lending any more money to Europe. It is high time they were paying back what they borrowed, and thus help relieve us of our heavy burden of taxation.

Mr. GLASS. Nobody has heard the Senator get up here and say anything unkind about Germany when it is proposed to loan her $1,000,000,000 of the taxpayers' money.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator probably has not been in the Chamber, for it has been only a very short time since I got up here and made a very severe criticism about the failure of Germany to pay the charges for maintaining our troops over there as she agreed to do. I have brought that question up on the floor time and time again. I can not help it if the Senator from Virginia has not been present and has not heard what I said.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, well, if the Senator from Virginia was not present he was occupied with more serious matters somewhere else.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am quite sure of that.

Mr. GLASS. He was transacting the business of the Senate in committee.

Mr. President, I hate to lose poise; but I confess to some degree of irritation at certain things that have happened recently in this Chamber. I wish I might hear one kind word said of the people who we joined, rather belatedly some think, in winning the World War. Instead we are treated day in and day out to "poor Germany" this and "poor Germany" that, and told how the people of Germany are suffering, as if no other people are suffering.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator will certainly do me the justice to say that he never heard me utter any such sentiments.

Mr. GLASS. I regret very much to have heard my friend and colleague assail this afternoon, as I conceive without proper warrant, our great ally in the recent war and undertake to prejudice the Congress and people of the United States against Great Britain because when, with her back to the wall she was fighting for civilization, for our cause as well as for her own, she interrupted momentarily our commerce on the seas.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I believe America's part in the war was just as honorable as that of Great Britain, and that we helped Britain far more than Britain helped us. Speaking about the soldiers, I recall that it has been but a short time ago when a measure for the relief of our own soldiers was before the Senate, and that measure, costing as much as it would, would not have cost as much as the proposed subsidy to Great Britain if this proposed trade goes through; and yet my recollection is that some of us—not I, because I was very much in favor of it, but quite a number of us—voted against the measure in favor of the soldiers. It does seem to me that we ought to be willing to treat the soldiers of our own war as fairly as we are willing to treat the soldiers of Great Britain or the Government of Great Britain; and I, for one, would infinitely prefer to vote for a bonus for our own soldiers, many of whom have been without employment, rather than to vote this bonus or subsidy for Great Britain at this time.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The bills to which I referred—I did not have in mind the one to which the Senator from Virginia referred, that is pending in committee—the bills to which I referred that propose to extend further credits to Europe upon the credit of foreign governments have been reported, and are on the calendar of the Senate, and I have not heard the Senator from Tennessee denounce any of those bills.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will just listen whenever they come up, he will find the Senator from Tennessee not only denouncing them but voting against them. I am absolutely opposed to them. I do not think any other credits ought to be given to European countries until they begin to pay us, at any rate.

Mr. LENROOT. I am very glad to hear it.

Mr. McKELLAR. And I shall certainly vote against them; and, if it will do the Senator any good, though I do not like to talk much, I will certainly make speeches against them, and in the same emphatic way that I am making a speech against giving this enormous subsidy to Great Britain.

Mr. LENROOT. I merely wanted to ask the Senator if I was incorrect in my recollection—and he will correct me if I am—if he did not vote to take up the Norris bill, which provided for that very thing, as against the rural credit bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Norris bill? I can not say, Mr. President.

Mr. LENROOT. I may be wrong in my recollection upon that subject.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator is wrong, but I should have to look at the record myself to see. I do not recall what the facts were with reference to it. I have no independent recollection about my vote on that proposal.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, just a word.

The Senator from Tennessee very obviously made a reference a while ago to my attitude on the soldiers' bonus. I have never made any concealment of my feeling on that subject. I was against the soldiers' bonus. I always will be against it. I was against it upon economic considerations, and against it upon sentimental considerations. I do not think the Federal Treasury could bear the tax at this time; I do not think that the tax-burdened people of the country should be subjected to that additional exaction.

I do not think the financial, commercial, and industrial interests of the country should be distressed by embarkation on any such economic policy. Moreover, I am against having the patriotic services of American boys computed in dollars and cents and so commercialized as that hereafter when we may have to fight a war for the protection of civilization we may have to stop and inquire what it is going to cost in dollars and cents.

As to voting any subsidy for Great Britain, that is a figment of the Senator's imagination. Great Britain is too proud a nation to suggest to the United States or any other nation the idea of voting her a subsidy. She has not asked for a subsidy. There is no proposition pending to vote her a subsidy of any description. She has simply appointed a debt commission, at our invitation, to discuss the adjustment of her indebtedness to the United States, with statements from her responsible statesmen that she proposes to pay the last dollar of it.

What I fail to understand, what seems most singular to me, is that at this stage of the proceedings any Senator should feel called upon to stand in his place and raspingly criticize this nation that was our ally, this nation whose Navy protected us from the ravages of the enemy for the preliminary months of the war in which we were engaged, and whose million and a half dead soldiers died in the very cause that we made our own.

Yes; I am not a little exasperated that we seem so soon to have forgotten the men and nations with whom we were associated in the war as to direct all our thought and all our generous sentiment to aiding and helping those who a little while ago were trying to destroy our civilization. All our criticisms seem now directed against those with whom we were comrades in arms.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, it is quite as exasperating to me that the people of Great Britain and the Government of Great Britain have so soon forgotten the great help that this Nation was to her, not only in saving civilization but in saving her empire. She may be too proud to ask for concessions on this debt, but she is making powerful efforts to obtain them just the same.

Mr. GLASS. In what sense has she forgotten our help, and in what manner is she seeking to evade her financial obligations?

Mr. McKELLAR. By sending her commission over here to get terms of settlement less than those to which she had agreed.

Mr. GLASS. How does the Senator know that?

Mr. McKELLAR. I judge it by the fact that the commission has been over here and by the statements given out in the newspapers on both sides.

Mr. GLASS. Does not the Senator know perfectly well that the loan of this country to Great Britain is now in such shape as that it can not be paid but must be funded under the terms of the act?

Mr. McKELLAR. Quite the contrary; Great Britain is already making her interest payments on the loan, and under the terms of the act for which the Senator voted; but this proposal is to disregard the terms of that act, and it is of that that I am complaining.

Mr. GLASS. Whose proposal is it to disregard the terms of the act?

Mr. McKELLAR. The British commission says that it is the American commission's proposal.

Mr. GLASS. Then why not assail the American commission? Why assail the British commission?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not understand why the Senator can not see that my criticisms have been just as much against the American commission for having proposed it, if they did propose it, as against Great Britain for having accepted it. I have criticized that commission. I have been on my feet almost daily criticizing the commission for not giving the American people the facts about it.

Mr. GLASS. Does the Senator seriously think that Great Britain would dishonor herself, or any one of our allies would dishonor herself, if she should accept terms of adjustment more favorable than those originally proposed?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I can not say that, of course.

Mr. GLASS. That is what the Senator did say.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; here is what I say: That that commission has been over here in secret session with a commission appointed by this Government for the past several weeks, a month or more, and we find that the result is that the terms laid down by the Congress, which were in accordance with the terms under which this money was borrowed from us, have been disregarded, according to the newspapers; and I am addressing myself to that.

Mr. GLASS. Disregarded by whom, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. McKELLAR. Disregarded both by the British Government, who borrowed the money, and by the commission which is acting for the American Government.

Mr. GLASS. Does the Senator seriously think that the British commission ought not to accept terms proposed by the American commission that are less onerous than the original terms of the loan?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course I do. If the British commission knows anything about the American Government, it knows that the members of the American commission have no authority whatsoever to make such a proposal; that the members of the American commission are limited by law and by their oaths of office to carrying out the statute of the United States already passed. They are governed by that statute.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, Mr. President, I understand that, of course, and therefore, being limited and being required to report back to Congress, and Congress itself having to act finally upon the proposition, I wonder why the Senator should abuse Great Britain for sending a commission over here at our own invitation to confer with a commission appointed by Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know whether the Senator caught what I intended to convey, or not, but my purpose was to say this in unmistakable language: If this proposed settlement is as the newspapers give it, the members of the American commission have violated the law under which they were appointed. The British commission ought to know that the American commission had not any right to make such a proposal, and I doubt very much whether they have made such a proposal. I will never believe it until they come forward here and say they have made such a proposal.

Mr. GLASS. But the Senator has premised everything he said upon the assumption that the thing had been done.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; the proposal has no doubt been made by somebody, and somebody has accepted it in some way. There is no doubt in the world but that a tentative agreement has been entered into between these two commissions, which tentative agreement is at war with the act of Congress under which our commission was appointed; and I am opposed to Congress agreeing to any proposal different from what we originally agreed to.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I think I now clearly understand what the Senator from Tennessee intended.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sorry I have been unable to make myself plain. I thought I was able to make myself plain.

Mr. GLASS. Well, it was my fault; it was my stupidity, but—

Mr. McKELLAR. No; quite the contrary. It was my fault in not expressing myself clearly.

Mr. GLASS. I have now reached the conclusion that the Senator from Tennessee thinks that because our American Debt Commission is supposed to have proposed a different settlement of these foreign debts from that which the Congress had in mind, therefore it is expedient to twist the lion's tail.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, well, if the Senator wants to indulge in that kind of statement, that is entirely all right. It is not what I said at all.

Mr. LENROOT and Mr. HEFLIN addressed the Chair.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. As I understand the Senator's viewpoint, his criticism is that England entered into a solemn contract, as did the others, to pay 5 per cent, and now they should not, according to his view, make any proposition different from that?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; the Senator did not understand me that way at all—could not have done so; it is absolutely impossible.

Mr. LENROOT. It was the sacredness of the obligation to which the Senator referred.

Mr. McKELLAR. This is what I said; I said that Great Britain borrowed this money under the terms of an act of Congress which provided that Great Britain should pay the same rate of interest which the American Government had to pay for the money, and that any reduction in that rate was a violation of the contract which Great Britain made.

Mr. LENROOT. That was not the contract.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; it was. It was the original contract. I don't know when, why, or how she gave us the 5 per cent obligations, but it is a fact she gave them to us and we now hold them.

Mr. LENROOT. The contract was to pay 5 per cent, was it not?

Mr. McKELLAR. That was subsequently entered into.

Mr. LENROOT. That is the existing contract, is it not?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the existing contract.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, the Senator complains over any proposal to modify that contract?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no. I have never complained that the Congress was wrong in fixing the rate the same as we had to pay. I voted for that act.

Mr. LENROOT. What is it the Senator complains of?

Mr. McKELLAR. I voted for the measure, and so did the Senator, voluntarily, to make the interest agreement conform precisely, or as nearly as possible, to the original agreement under which the money was borrowed.

Mr. LENROOT. Then it was the Congress which first proposed, not only to England but all the other European countries, that their existing contracts be modified?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. And the Senator complains that the United States itself, proposing to modify an existing contract, is subject to this severe attack, if they suggest that there be a different modification than that proposed by our Government?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; because Congress has solemnly gone on record setting out the limitations under which the American commission could act. The commission had no power or authority to make a different proposal to the British commission.

Mr. LENROOT. I know; but can they not address their proposals to this Government, which includes Congress?

Mr. McKELLAR. They can, but they are so silent about it that it does not look like we will ever get it from them.

Mr. LENROOT. Has anyone ever proposed that the Debt Commission shall accept this proposal and violate the act of Congress?

Mr. McKELLAR. The English commission affirm, over on the other side, when they get back, that the American commission had made this proposal, which is beyond any authority which it had.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator think the American Debt Commission proposes, without action of Congress, to carry out the proposal that is in question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Being absolutely in the dark, being absolutely unable to get any expression from the members of the American Debt Commission, I can not tell the Senator what the American Debt Commission proposes.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the Senator know that no action can be taken without action by Congress?

Mr. McKELLAR. I imagine not, though I do not know what action may be attempted.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator does not know? I did not want to do the Senator any injustice with reference to his record on the vote to which I have referred, and I want to clear that up. I find that the record on the motion to take up the Norris bill shows that the Senator was present but did not vote; that he was paired, and stated, in announcing his pair, "I have a pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. New]. I do not see him in the Chamber, so I withhold my vote." But the Senator did not state what his position was.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not recall now what my position was. I do not know whether I would have voted for it or against it. Probably that was why I did not express myself. I do not remember just exactly what the issue at stake at that particular time was, but I was quite confident I had not voted as the Senator stated.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am not going to enter into a discussion of this debt settlement proposition. It is evident to my mind that there were a good many people in the Congress who intended to cancel all this indebtedness, and this partial arrangement they have made, I think, came from the British Government. It is suggested in the newspapers that they have accepted a proposition made by us. I think it is a proposition they made themselves, for 3 per cent and $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, with nearly three-fourths of a century to pay the money. Two generations will come and go before that debt is wiped out.

The Senator from Tennessee has stirred up a hornet's nest by his protest against taxing the American people and giving to Great Britain or any other foreign country, when sixty-odd million of the American people are in distress to-day. Some people may not know that, but that is the truth.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I suppose the Senator saw yesterday that two prominent American diplomats, some time ago, made a proposal at a banquet at No. 10 Downing Street to settle this debt at from 2 to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; that the British people felt greatly outraged that the word of those two diplomats had not been carried out by the American Government, and that they were very greatly disappointed because it had not been carried out. I asked the names of those diplomats, but I could not get them; that is, I have not been able to get them. But I find in an editorial in a good Republican paper, by the way, as I understand it, the Waukegan Daily Sun—

Mr. WADSWORTH. Where is Waukegan?

Mr. McKELLAR. In Illinois. I will read from the editorial. Waukegan is out there where Mr. Baldwin says the people are all "hog raisers." I will read what he says about this first commission:

It was reported from abroad that at a London tea party Taft and Harvey promised Bonar Law that the United States would give a refunding period of some sixty-odd years at an interest rate of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. This means a gift of billions of dollars. In regard to international debts, Taft and Harvey represent none other than themselves personally. However, if they attempted to defeat the debt refunding act they are sworn to enforce, Harvey should be recalled by Harding, and Taft is open to impeachment charges if upon investigation Congress finds an international conspiracy to defy and defeat the will of Congress.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has the Senator ever asked Chief Justice Taft whether there was any truth in that?

Mr. McKELLAR. No.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Why does he not?

Mr. McKELLAR. I had no idea who it was. I stated in my speech here the other day that I had no idea who the diplomats were.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just a moment ago the Senator said he had been trying to find out who those two diplomats were.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yet one of the men named could be found in the Supreme Court Chamber, which is about 150 feet away, and the Senator could find out at any time if he had the courage to ask him.

Mr. McKELLAR. There was no question of courage, I assure you. I never saw the paper giving names until to-day.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator a question. Was that before Chief Justice Taft made a visit to London last summer?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am just reading from the newspaper.

Mr. LODGE. Will not the Senator kindly tell us who the thinker is who makes that admirable statement?

Mr. McKELLAR. W. J. Smith is the editor of the paper—the Waukegan Daily Sun, of Waukegan, Ill.

Mr. LODGE. A newspaper I am afraid I never heard of.

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps so; and yet there are some people out West and some newspapers.

Mr. LODGE. There are.

Mr. McKELLAR. Quite a number out there, who, perhaps, have something to think occasionally and to say about international affairs.

Mr. HEFLIN. They at least have votes out there.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am so informed.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the Senator know what Chief Justice Taft went to London for last year?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no knowledge on the subject at all, and did not even know he was there, and knew nothing in the world about it, except what I saw in this paper.

Mr. HEFLIN. He made a trip over there.

Mr. McKELLAR. I say that if Mr. Taft and Mr. Harvey made any such proposition as that to the British Government, they did it purely as individuals; they did not bind anybody, and could not bind anybody, and should not bind anybody.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I hope I may be permitted to submit a few observations myself. Mr. Taft, before he was appointed Chief Justice, I believe, went to London. I do not know what he went for, but he went over there since the election of 1920. Several newspaper editors of the United States went over there, too, last year. I do not know what they went for. I have heard that some of them were interested in debt cancellation. I think that is true.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask the Senator what reason he has for thinking that is true?

Mr. HEFLIN. I think it is true for several reasons, one because I have heard it talked about the Capitol, and I believe it is true.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is that all the ground the Senator has?

Mr. HEFLIN. Because I believe it is true?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator has heard it "talked."

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not have to tell the Senator in detail all the reasons I have for it. I make the statement. I think it is true.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then the Senator is responsible for the statement itself?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am responsible for the statement I made.

Mr. WADSWORTH. All right.

Mr. HEFLIN. I think the Senator represents a State that has a good many obligations owing to it by Great Britain and by other foreign countries, which it would like to collect and could quickly collect if this whole debt could be canceled. I think the propaganda is in Wall Street to cancel the whole thing, and the Senator represents in part the State in which Wall Street is located. I never saw a covey of birds so flushed as the Senator from Tennessee seemed to flush them this afternoon. He was talking for the American people. He is trying to represent this Government here in the Senate and not Great Britain. There are some of us here who do that, and we are going to continue to do it. We are going to have a house cleaning on the other side of the Chamber and a little on this side next year, and bring people here who speak for the American people and not for Great Britain or any other foreign power, when the issue is whether America's side shall be presented or Great Britain's or some other country's side shall be presented.

I want to treat Great Britain fairly. I am the friend of the mother country. I am glad that her soldiers fought side by side with our soldiers, but it has been said, and one would think that there is a great deal of truth in it, that England possesses the greatest diplomats in the world. England knows how to handle things in a diplomatic way for her special good and general welfare, and it is her business to look out for that just as it is our business and the business of the Chief Executive of our country and the business of the diplomats of our country to handle the situation to the very best interest of the American people. While I am a friend of Great Britain, I am on the side of my own country in this matter.

I want to treat Great Britain fairly, but I want this money paid to the American people. It belongs to them. I speak for a part of the country which has a farming population nine-tenths of whom are under mortgage to-day, bound hand and foot to pay debts unloaded on them by the deflation of 1920 and 1921, carried on by the Republican Party, promised in its national platform in 1920 and promised by the Republican President in his acceptance speech, and carried out under Republican direction without the protest of a single leading Republican in either branch of Congress. This Government does not belong to the greedy special interests in this country. You can always tell, though, when you step on the toes of those interests. You can spot them. Ah, they come to the rescue.

Oh, Mr. President, we are not offending Great Britain. Stanley Baldwin, the Englishman, can go back and reflect upon the intelligence of the great grain-growing West, from whose broad plains came a million American boys to fight and die on foreign soil for Great Britain's liberty and the liberty of the world. None of these Senators here criticized him. They do not say anything against him. The Senator from Tennessee took him to task, and properly so, and now, when a Senator in this body speaks for his own country, for the debt-ridden, tax-burdened people of America, he is taken severely to task for what some call arraigning Great Britain. He comes from Tennessee, the great State of Old Hickory Jackson. We need more of his kind in this body, who will talk for his own country when his own country's rights are involved.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not only did Baldwin reflect upon the people of the West but he reflected upon the Senators from the West.

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have invited them to respond as to what they thought about his reflections upon them and they are silent.

Mr. HEFLIN. There have been a good many couriers to London, doubtless, who went out from New York. They said, I imagine, "We think we can handle this foreign indebtedness all right. We can probably get the whole debt canceled." I think a promise was made by the Republican Party leaders in 1920 that these debts would be canceled. I have a suspicion of that sort. I think there is ground for it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has the Senator as much ground for that assertion as he had for the assertion that Judge Taft went over there on a private mission to cancel the debts?

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the Senator deny that Judge Taft went over there?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not that he went over there; no.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator admits that Judge Taft went over there?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the Senator admit that he [Mr. WADSWORTH] represents Wall Street?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then, I have no further questions for the Senator just now.

Mr. President, of course I have my opinion about whether he does or not. The Senator said he does not, and I must accept his statement. But I want to get back to the issue here.

I am satisfied that over there in those nice little secret circles in London they have said, "We think we can arrange debt cancellation. Get us in power, and maybe we can wipe out the whole debt. Good! Fill 'em up again." When they got over here they found some Democrats here with backbone and some few Republicans, and some in the House, who took the American view of the thing and put some restrictions around the commission on our part, although it was a partisan commission. They could not go the limit, as they probably thought they would be able to go. They were disappointed. I think when they got in secret council over here that probably our commissioners told them, "We would like to do this or that, but our hands are tied. We would like to cancel the whole thing, so far as we are concerned, but let us not say anything about that. Our hands are tied. It may be we can get additional powers." One of them came up here one day and said on the floor of the Senate they would have to have additional powers.

Now Great Britain has gone back, having brought down the interest rate from 5 per cent to 3 and 3½ per cent. The farmers of the United States are paying to-day 5 and 6 per cent to lift the mortgage from the roofs where their wives and children dwell. But you have provided for Great Britain 3 per cent and 3½ per cent, with 62 years' time in which to pay it. The baby born to-day will be 62 years old when it is paid under your plan. So they went back and jumped on the United States. Wall Street is a very nice spot in their minds. They do not like the western country or the western crowd. They raise hogs and sell beeves, they tell us. Thank God they have intelligence and votes, and they can use them and did use them right effectively in the last election. Next year there is going to be a perfect cyclone. Some of the Senators I see over yonder—the places that know them now will know them no more forever. The cyclone is going to take them up and sweep them out. We are going to have a whole-hearted American sentiment expressed in this Chamber. The time should come when an American who would preach American doctrine will not be arraigned for assailing Great Britain for simply asking that Great Britain pay the debt due us, and that she be not allowed to obtain money here at interest rates below those which the people who are supporting this Government with their substance in time of peace and fighting for its preservation in time of war have to pay. That is what we have—3 and 3½ per cent to a foreign nation, 5 and 6 per cent to our own people who pay the taxes and fight for the Government in the hour of its peril.

Is the Senator who protests against such as that to be criticized and condemned in this Chamber?

In the debate the bonus question has been brought up, and it has been said that the soldiers were commercializing their patriotism and that we have to pay them for their valor, and that when we come to have another war we will have to figure up how much it will cost.

Mr. President, I do not ever expect to permit any Senator in this body—I do not care whether he calls himself a Democrat or whether he is a Republican—to insult the soldiers of America who have asked for adjusted compensation by saying that they are putting a price on their patriotism, commercializing it, when they ask for simple justice at the hands of the Government they love and for which they were willing to die.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Alabama has reference to me—has he?

Mr. HEFLIN. I have reference to part of the statement I heard the Senator make.

Mr. GLASS. I did not say the soldiers wanted to commercialize themselves. What I tried to say was that the politicians wanted to commercialize them.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is a good big body in both Houses that must plead guilty to Mr. Baldwin's statement that they were politicians. As I recall, there are more than two-thirds of the Members of the House and lacking but two or three of being two-thirds of the Senate, and before another session of Congress rolls around there will be more than two-thirds of both bodies in favor of doing the right thing for the soldiers, and a bill will pass, the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, Mr. President, as to the politicians seeking to commercialize the soldier, let me say if I had to take my choice between playing politics and defending the mistreated, neglected, and sometimes starving soldier who had nowhere to lay his head, no decent clothes to wear, nothing with which to feed his body, or vote to give to the profiteers $450,000,000 a year, as was done here, and exempt the big income-tax payers $90,000,000 a year, as was done here, and give to the ship subsidy $50,000,000 a year, as is proposed here, I would take my stand on the side of the soldier of my country and demand simple justice for him.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator who votes for adjusted compensation is the friend of the soldier. The Senator who voted to call the soldier to the colors and then permitted him to go to the battle front and come back and be discharged in a land panic stricken, industrially and commercially dead, labor unemployed and roaming the streets, and that poor fellow with no place to eat or sleep—do you say that those who want to help him are trying to commercialize him? No; that is not the situation at all. It is indifference and ingratitude on the part of some to the soldier who offered his life, his all, for his country.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator knows that I supported the bonus bill and took the attitude that the soldier should be awarded a very generous bonus. I would like to ask the Senator how much his State of Alabama has paid in the way of a bonus to the hungry, starving soldiers of the State of Alabama?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not know.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, surely the Senator knows.

Mr. HEFLIN. No; I do not know, and, Mr. President, that is not a question for the State. No State in the Union ought to be burdened as a State to pay this debt to a soldier who fought in the Union Army to fight on foreign soil. That is a national question and in no sense a State question.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. Every State government that has done it did it because the Republican Party here at the Capitol refused in the National Congress to provide a dollar of adjusted compensation for the boys. It was tax the State or starve. That is why the States did it; not because they wanted to do it. They did it because the national Republican Party refused to do it and these boys were about to starve.

Mr. LENROOT. But the State of Alabama did not. The State of Alabama preferred to let them starve, according to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Not at all. In the State of Alabama our people took them in and fed them and cared for those who needed aid somehow, but in the Senator's State and in some other States in the North where there are large cities there is where they suffered. I have helped some of them here out of my own pocket.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator on more than one occasion has seemed to delight in saying something about the North and the East. He has brought in sectional questions. He has undertaken to tell us something about the State of New York and a certain portion of that State. Does the Senator recollect the fact that the State of New York, by a majority of 500,000, in popular referendum voted a bond issue of $40,000,000 for the veterans?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to hear it. That is very much to the credit of New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Where was Alabama when that was being done?

Mr. HEFLIN. Being robbed by New York! [Laughter.] The big speculators, financiers of New York City, robbed the people of my State through deflation in one year of $103,000,000 on the Alabama cotton crop of 1920. Talk about where we were! We were trying to keep from starving ourselves under Republican deflation.

Mr. LENROOT. Is that why the State of Alabama let her soldiers starve?

Mr. HEFLIN. The State of Alabama has not let her soldiers starve. The people of Alabama want justice for the American soldier. The State of Alabama knows that this is a national question. When the people of Alabama give anything to the soldier they give it to him quietly and say nothing about it, but every time you give him a dollar you stand on the housetop and crow like a rooster. [Laughter.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator know what year it was that the people of New York made that decision for the soldier?

Mr. HEFLIN. No.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator is light-hearted and reckless somewhat in his statements. He said, just by way of crawling out of the corner—

Mr. HEFLIN. I am painstaking and accurate enough to tell the truth about the State of New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understand what the truth is. The Senator does not have to endeavor to enlighten me about the truth.

Mr. HEFLIN. Under deflation it took $1,625,000,000 from the cotton-growing States on one cotton crop in 1920.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator probably does not know, as he knows nothing about what the people of New York have done, in spite of his reckless statements—

Mr. HEFLIN. I have not time to yield for a defense of that conduct of New York in my time. If the Senator wants to ask a question—

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have asked a question, and the Senator could not answer it. I asked when it was the people of New York voted on that referendum?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not know and I do not care.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But it has something to do with the Senator's rejoinder that the people of New York had taken money from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is no uncommon thing.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As a matter of fact, at that time the people of Alabama were immensely prosperous, with the highest cotton prices probably ever known.

Mr. HEFLIN. When was it you did that?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In 1920.

Mr. HEFLIN. Why, that is the year they robbed us in Alabama of $103,000,000 on the cotton crop. [Laughter.]

No, Mr. President, I can see these upstanding men now, as brave and patriotic as ever drew the breath of life. I see them going away with that flag. I see them going out upon the seas, and I see them coming back, but I see them forgotten by some Senators just a little while after they return. But I have not seen the profiteers forgotten. I have not seen those who fed upon the Government in the hour of its distress forgotten, and I have not heard them arraigned by anybody who fights the soldiers' bonus.

I stood for adjusted compensation. I am for them because it is right, it is just, it is honest to be for them. When I hear talk about commercializing patriotism, and the soldier being played upon by politicians, I intend to resent it and I do resent it.

Now, Mr. President, that is about all I care to say this evening.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. I merely wanted to go on record as saying a word in behalf of some of the statements of my friend, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar]—I did not hear all of his speech—and to speak for the American people somewhat about a debt that is due to them. Does Wall Street want to collect her money from Great Britain and have this whole debt held up until she can collect it? She did have it held up, it seems, until she collected $1,700,000,000 from France and Great Britain. Does she want to have this debt held up for 62 years so she can go on undisturbed and collect the other money due her from the various countries? I am here to represent the people, to represent in part my State; I am not here to represent the bond sharks, the big financiers of Wall Street. I want the American people to have a fair deal. This is not a court where men are employed—

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not—

Mr. LODGE. I rise to a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the point of order.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order that no Senator has a right to charge other Senators with representing bond sharks and gamblers.

Mr. HEFLIN. I made no such charge.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator just made it by inference.

Mr. HEFLIN. Not at all. I mentioned bond sharks in New York, the bond sharks and financiers of Wall Street.

Mr. LODGE. But the Senator contrasted the rest of the Senate with himself naturally.

Mr. HEFLIN. Let the notes be read.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask that the reporter's notes be read.

Mr. HEFLIN. I made no such statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The notes will be read.

The Official Reporter read as follows:

I am here to represent the people, to represent in part my State; I am not here to represent the bond sharks, the big financiers of Wall Street.

Mr. LODGE. That is a direct reference to other Senators, of course.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President—

Mr. WADSWORTH. It was an inference.

Mr. HEFLIN. I said I was not representing them here; that I was going to speak for the people.

Mr. LENROOT. And what about the other Senators?

Mr. HEFLIN. I did not say anything about other Senators. The Senator from Massachusetts will next make a point of order against what he imagines. That is all his present point of order is founded on. I did not make the charge—

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

Mr. LODGE. I thought the Senator would stand by what he said.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes. The notes show what I said, and just what I said I do stand by.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, that means that the other Senators here do not represent the American people—

Mr. HEFLIN. I did not say that.

Mr. LODGE. But do represent the bond sharks of Wall Street. It is perfectly clear.

Mr. HEFLIN. I did not say that. The Senator can not put words in my mouth. He can think what he pleases, and I can think what I please.

Mr. LODGE. But I can put them in the RECORD.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator can put them in the RECORD, but he can not change what I think or what I say.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator said a little while back that the Chief Justice of the United States represented Wall Street?

Mr. HEFLIN. No; I did not.

Mr. LENROOT. I appeal to the RECORD.

Mr. HEFLIN. Let the RECORD be read, but I did not say that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The statement was made 20 minutes or so ago.

Mr. LENROOT. I think it ought to be read.

Mr. LODGE. I also think the notes should be read.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The matter is so serious that I insist that it be ascertained whether or not the Senator from Alabama asserted upon the floor of the United States Senate that the Chief Justice of the United States represented Wall Street.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Alabama did not say any such thing, and there is no one else in the Senate except the Senator from New York and one or two other Republicans who think so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the RECORD be brought in.

Mr. HEFLIN. Bring it in. I said "when he went to London"; and he went to London before he was Chief Justice, I think.

Mr. MOSES. No; he did not; he went as Chief Justice.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; he went as Chief Justice.

Mr. HEFLIN. Did he?

Mr. MOSES. He went as Chief Justice to deliver some lectures on our political system.

Mr. HEFLIN. That makes it still stronger.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Again the Senator has offended.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama should take his seat until this matter is determined.

Mr. HEFLIN. While it is being determined, I will proceed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask that the Senator be required to take his seat.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama has been called to order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Alabama has been called to order and under the rule he has to take his seat. Mr. President, I ask that the Reporter may read the remarks referred to.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will take my seat and will proceed when the Senator is through.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No debate is in order.

Mr. HEFLIN. And then I will proceed at length.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I did not hear any statement made by the Senator from Alabama with reference to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. I heard the statement made by the Senator from Alabama, which was quoted a moment ago from the notes, and I maintain that, under the rule of the Senate, it did not charge or impute to any Senator unworthy motives or conduct. In order to come within the rule of the Senate it is necessary that the Senator called to order shall use language which directly or indirectly imputes "to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator." The language of the Senator from Alabama read by the Reporter and for which he has been called to order was substantially, "I do not represent bond sharks or gamblers." It would be an infringement of the freedom of debate for the Presiding Officer of this body to hold that a declaration of that character imputes an unworthy motive or misconduct to another Senator.

It may be true that in the manner of expression, in the general attitude of the Senator from Alabama, in the subconscious mind of Senators that implication is justified, but the Chair in determining points of order made in the Senate must determine the question from the language employed by the Senator called to order.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I think before deciding upon the matter the Senator ought to read the whole context of and connection in which the statement of the Senator from Alabama was made.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Massachusetts would not be so unkind as to require me to read the entire speech of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. LODGE. I did not intend that. I intended merely that the whole statement from the notes of the Reporter should be read.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Massachusetts would not, in justice, impose any such obligation upon the Presiding Officer. When a Senator objects to language employed by another Senator upon this floor he specifies the language to which he objects and he calls the Senator to order for the employment of that language. That is exactly what occurred a few moments ago.

The Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from New York jointly objected to a statement made by the Senator from Alabama as violative of the rules of the Senate governing debate in this body. The language employed does not impute to any Senator conduct or motive unworthy of a Senator. If it be held that implications or inferences arrived at by Senators from the general context of a speech delivered by a Senator warrant the conclusion that there is in the mind of the Senator something that he has not expressed obnoxious to the rule, freedom of debate will be destroyed.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, far be it from me to suggest that he shall read the whole speech; that I would not willingly inflict on anybody; but I wanted read the whole of what the Reporter read, because that shows the meaning, in my judgment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator has not made a point of order against the language except that already read by the Reporter. I do not know what other utterances may be in the speech of the Senator from Alabama which may give offense to the Senator from Massachusetts or to other Senators, but my discussion is, of course, confined to the point of order raised.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the words that I objected to were read by the Reporter. The Senator from Arkansas has only stated a part of them.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator can repeat them in his own language.

Mr. LODGE. I do not want to repeat them, but I want them read from the notes of the Reporter.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Reporter has read the statement once, although I have no objection to having it read again.

Mr. LODGE. I think the whole sentence and context ought to be understood.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Arkansas only quoted a few words which were detached from the statement.

Mr. ROBINSON. I quoted, as I think, the substance of the language employed by the Senator from Alabama, as read by the Reporter. What is the language read by the Reporter that has not been quoted which the Senator thinks brings the statement within the rule of the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. The Reporter may read the words which he previously read, from which the Senator from Arkansas partly quoted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The notes will be read as soon as the Reporter can return to the Chamber.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Alabama said, "I do not represent the bond sharks and gamblers." Of course, I do not think anybody does, certainly not the Senator from Alabama. That statement by itself is of minor consequence.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the remainder of the language?

Mr. LODGE. The remainder of the language was, "I represent the American people"—I do not remember all of it—pointing to Senators generally.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well, Mr. President.

Mr. LODGE. I think the inference was plain, and that the Senator from Arkansas agrees with me.

Mr. ROBINSON. If a Senator can not assert on this floor that he represents the American people, it has come to a pitiable state in the progress of debate in the American Congress.

Mr. LODGE. Although it is a large representation, still I have no objection to that statement standing alone. It is a combination of the two sentences to which I object and the way in which they were uttered.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. Mr. President, then, the statement objected to, as the Senator from Massachusetts remembers it, is, "I do not represent bond sharks and gamblers; I represent the American people."

Mr. LODGE. No; that is not it. I want the words read as they were uttered, not as the Senator from Arkansas or I may repeat them from memory.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let them be read.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have just quoted the language as the Senator from Massachusetts remembers it.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that it be read—

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well; let it be read again and again.

Mr. LODGE. Not as I remember it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Reporter will read the language.

The Official Reporter read as follows:

I am here to represent the people, to represent in part my State. I am not here to represent the bond sharks, the big financiers of Wall Street.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is a perfectly legitimate statement. If the Senator from Alabama said anything about his State at all and made any contrary statement he would not long represent a constituency from Alabama or anywhere else. I repeat that the language under the rules of the Senate is not obnoxious.

In this connection let me point out the fact that during the course of this debate, while the Senator from Alabama presumably was proceeding in order, for no Senator had called him to order, a Senator upon the other side made a remark which provoked language from the Senator from Alabama that more nearly transgressed the rule than the language objected to by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from New York. The Senator from Wisconsin, describing the action of the State which he so ably represents, touching the subject of the bonus, inquired derisively as to what action Alabama had taken. If implication and inferences render statements by Senators obnoxious to the rule, then it would appear that the question of the Senator from Wisconsin, and the words of the Senator from New York, for that matter, in the language that he used in the same connection, reflected upon the State of Alabama. The references to New York by the Senator from Alabama and to the latter State by the Senator from New York and the Senator from Wisconsin, however, were not objected to.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see about the analogy. Would the Senator say, if it were charged by a Senator that another Senator did represent the bond sharks of Wall Street, that it would be out of order or not?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think, if the intention were to impute unworthy conduct or misconduct, it would be out of order.

Mr. LENROOT. Then a statement, if it had been made directly, that the Senator from New York, for instance, represented the bond sharks of Wall Street would have been out of order.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think so.

Mr. LENROOT. I am sure if would. Then, with reference to the question I asked, namely, "Where did Alabama stand?" if the answer had been that Alabama had not voted a bonus, does the Senator think that would have been a reflection on the State of Alabama?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think it is entirely true, Mr. President, that the inquiry of the Senator from Wisconsin was provoked by the discussion between the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from New York. It is not my province to pass judgment upon either the allusion to New York or the reference to Alabama, although both might well have been omitted. The point I am making is that the language for which the Senator from Alabama was called to order, under the plain rule of the Senate and the common-sense construction that must be given to the rule of the Senate, is not obnoxious. Perhaps I might also add that in debates of this character Senators by interruption frequently provoke one another to statements that are not proper within the strict letter of the rule; but as to the particular statement objected to, the point of order made by the Senator from Massachusetts does not lie. The Senator from Alabama had a right to use the language that he did employ. He did not impute unworthy motives or misconduct to any Senator; the effect of his words was to vindicate his own motives and conduct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. LENROOT rose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin desire to address the Chair?

Mr. LENROOT. I was merely going to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that he withdraw the point of order and let us go on.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the Chair might just as well rule, inasmuch as the point of order has been made and the Chair is ready to rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is ready to rule.

The language of the rule is that—

No Senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator.

If it were merely the words spoken by the Senator, the Chair would be inclined to rule that no such imputation was intended; but with the context, the attitude, and the expression that went with them, the Chair is of the opinion that they did contain an imputation to other Senators unworthy and unbecoming, and that the words were not in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. ROBINSON. I shall have to have the yeas and nays on that—

Mr. HEFLIN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROBINSON. Unless the Senator from Massachusetts desires—

Mr. LODGE. I was just going to move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest, then, the absence of a quorum, if the Senator wants to do that.

Mr. LODGE. I make that motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it is so late that I was going to suggest that we want a short executive session, and we might have an executive session and let this question go over and vote on it in the morning.

Mr. LODGE. It is too late now.

Mr. ROBINSON. We can vacate the proceedings.

Mr. CURTIS. By unanimous consent, we can vacate the proceedings. There will be a quorum present in the morning. I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings under the quorum call be vacated, that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, February 2, 1923, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 1, 1923.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, the Father of us all, so long as time shall last Thou art the refuge for all minds that think and for all hearts that feel. O richly endow us with faith and gratitude. Set us out to-day upon our errands with Thy blessing, and may all tasks be borne with patience and wisdom. Ever impress us with the high value of time and privilege, and may we trust Thee and not be afraid, for the best is yet to be. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 11731. An act to provide for the renting of the first floor of the customhouse at Mobile, Ala., to the Mobile Chamber of Commerce.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4404. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer to trustees to be named by the Chamber of Commerce of Columbia, S. C., certain lands at Camp Jackson, S. C.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13696) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes. The committee of conference have not agreed upon amendments Nos. 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 16, 25, 29, 30, 31, 32, and 33.

The message also announced that the Senate had concurred in the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 472) for the relief of William B. Lancaster.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana, from the Committee on Appropriations, presented for printing under the rule a conference report (H. Rept. 1497) and accompanying statement on the bill (H. R. 13696) making appropriations for the Executive Office and for sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes.

AMENDMENT OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I ask that there be taken from the Speaker's table the Senate bill 4390.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 4390, a similar House bill having been reported from the House committee before the Senate bill was received from the Senate. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4390) to amend the last paragraph of section 10 of the Federal reserve act as amended by the act of June 3, 1922.
Be it enacted, etc., That the last paragraph of section 10 of the Federal reserve act as amended by the act of June 3, 1922, is amended to read as follows:

"No Federal reserve bank shall have authority hereafter to enter into any contract or contracts for the erection of any branch bank building of any kind or character, or to authorize the erection of any such building, if the cost of the building proper, exclusive of the cost of the vaults, permanent equipment, furnishings, and fixtures, is in excess of $250,000: Provided, That nothing herein shall apply to any building now under construction."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS], I believe, wants to amend this bill.

Mr. SEARS. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Florida for the purpose of offering his amendment.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, on page 2, line 2, by striking out the word "now" and after the word "construction" inserting the words "prior to June 3, 1922."

In that connection I would like to state that—

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SEARS: Amend page 2, line 2, after the word "building," by striking out the word "now" and after the word "construction," in the same line, inserting the words "prior to June 3, 1922."

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to say to the Members of the House that when this bill passed the Senate Senator FLETCHER asked the question whether this bill took care of the branch bank at Jacksonville, Fla. He was assured that it did, but it seems the department has some doubt about the question. I have gone over the matter carefully with the chairman of the committee [Mr. McFADDEN] and also with the ranking Democratic Member [Mr. WINGO], and they have agreed to this amendment in order that there may be no doubt about Jacksonville being provided for.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman tell us what this does?

Mr. SEARS. This simply allows the branch bank at Jacksonville to come in under the Senate bill which we are now considering.

Mr. SNELL. What does it do?

Mr. SEARS. This allows the bank to expend not exceeding $250,000 on the building.

Mr. SNELL. How much additional do they intend spending?

Mr. SEARS. I have not the figures, but my recollection is the building, office fixtures, vault, and so forth, will not cost more than $375,000, which I assure the gentleman is very reasonable. Plans and specifications have already been agreed upon and the cost estimated.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The amendment of the gentleman from Florida means the same thing as the language of the bill; but here is the reason why we thought best to have him offer the amendment: We are rewriting a provision of the present statute; we make no change on the matter covered by his amendment. The proviso is now in the existing law. But one member of the Federal Reserve Board can not catch the point that this bill does not change that provision at all, and we are afraid some question might arise from a wrong technical construction. It means the same thing as the present language, but it will satisfy the viewpoint of one member of the board.

Mr. SNELL. I understand there is a limitation now on the cost of any branch-bank building.

Mr. WINGO. Yes. Under the present law the limit is $250,000, but it does not exclude vaults and permanent fixtures and equipment.

Mr. SNELL. That is the amount that could be expended on one of these branch banks?

Mr. WINGO. Yes. This bill leaves the amount identically the same, but it is the interpretation of the board that it would include the permanent vaults and fixtures as a part of the building. The original idea was that the building itself should not cost over $250,000 without a specific act of Congress in each case. This construes it to mean that the building proper should not exceed that amount. This puts in the language, "exclusive of the cost of the vaults, permanent equipment, furnishings, and fixtures."

Mr. SNELL. In some buildings those fixtures might be very expensive.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS. Yes; for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not intend to offer an amendment or take the floor away from the gentleman who has the floor now. Will the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] or the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] inform the House how many buildings are now in course of construction to which this amendment applies?

Mr. WINGO. The only one that I recall would be just the starting of the Jacksonville building. The building at Detroit, the building at Salt Lake, the building at Little Rock, and the branch-bank building of Jacksonville that it is contemplated will be erected in the immediate future—as soon as this bill is passed.

Mr. SNELL. Why is not Jacksonville in the same class as the others?

Mr. WINGO. It is.

Mr. SEARS. To be frank with my colleague, I will say they have started the excavation there, and the department said they might construe that as having begun work. If this bill passes without amendment, Jacksonville is out.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I understand from the gentleman from Arkansas that this proposed amendment does not increase the opportunity to spend money for erecting bank buildings. I am inclined to think that it does.

Mr. SNELL. That is the part I can not get clear.

Mr. GARNER. You can build a $500,000 vault and build a $250,000 house around it.

Mr. SNELL. What do they usually put into these vaults and fixtures?

Mr. GARNER. I do not think the bank should spend too much money, part of it what I consider the people's money, in building buildings. Under this condition could they not build a $500,000 vault and a $250,000 building around it?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; if they wanted to do that, but I do not think the gentleman will deny that if there is anybody who has been insisting on economy in these things it has been myself. I will tell you why I am for this. I think this will save the bank some money. I think if you permit them to come in with popgun bills, of which there are three pending in our committee now, they will spend twice as much before they get through, because if you allow every branch a special authorization to build a building, with the Congressman from that district coming and asking for it, I believe it will mean that not only will the time of the House be taken up, but these banks will spend more than they will under the general limitation provided by this bill. That is the reason why I want a general limitation.

Mr. SNELL. Why not put the limitation upon the amount they may spend for vaults and physical equipment?

Mr. WINGO. Because it is physically impossible to determine the amount of the cost of the vaults and the basements in buildings that might be erected in different parts of the country with different ground and different vault requirements.

Mr. SNELL. I understand that, but ought you not to put on a limit, so that they could not put a $500,000 vault in a $250,000 building?

Mr. WINGO. I have heard no proposition to build a $500,000 vault.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I have not control of the floor. The gentleman from Florida has the floor.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. I want to put a question to the gentleman who just made that statement.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, this is simply a question of whether or not Jacksonville shall be permitted to come in under the same provisions as other branch banks. If my amendment is adopted, then the Federal Reserve Board, I am satisfied, will provide or authorize the Jacksonville building, as both the House and Senate have indicated it was their desire this should be done. This is shown by the fact that last year Senator FLETCHER secured the passage of a resolution authorizing the expenditure of $400,000 by the branch of Jacksonville, but we have been unable to reach this resolution, and the bill now before us is a compromise, and is entirely satisfactory if my amendment is adopted.

My colleagues, Jacksonville is a thriving, rapidly growing, and progressive city, with a population of about 150,000. This branch bank must take care of the State of Florida and also Cuba.

The directors are safe, sane, and conservative. They could have built a costly building before the law of 1922 limiting the cost was passed, but then labor was high and the price of material was almost if not prohibitory, and they would not do so. Now, I am satisfied my colleagues will not punish them for being conservative. To erect a building for a sum less than provided in this bill will be false economy, for the building will barely be completed before they will need and must have a larger and better building and better facilities for handling the business.

I am satisfied the Federal Reserve Board, broad-minded and farsighted business men that they are, will appreciate the requirements of Jacksonville and will permit them to construct the building which will meet the requirements and which Congress has said they find is absolutely necessary.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman's amendment is entirely satisfactory to the committee, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me five minutes?

Mr. McFADDEN. I ask for a vote first on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield to me to offer an amendment?

Mr. McFADDEN. I have promised to yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Just so I am not cut off. I would like to offer an amendment.

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have a pretty fair understanding about the Federal reserve bank system. It was never intended that the Federal reserve banks of the United States were going to make a lot of money, but they have made fabulous profits, and they have invested fabulous sums of money in buildings out of those profits. Instead of amending bills to authorize them to put up buildings whenever and wherever they want to put them up, we should amend the law to limit the amount that they may earn. That is what we ought to do. [Applause.] That is what should have been done long since. Every time the banks show an excess amount of earnings they should be compelled to reduce the rediscount rate so as to keep their earnings within reason and thereby give to the borrowing public of the country an opportunity to get money at cheaper rates than they have been able to get it. [Applause.] The purpose of the creation of the Federal reserve system was to facilitate the transaction of the business of the country and to furnish credit at the least possible cost. Now, what do we find? We find that the Federal reserve system has been allowed to earn unlimited profits, to the very great disadvantage of the country, and it ought not to be permitted to continue to do that longer. The business people of the United States have gone through a serious period. They have had to struggle to make both ends meet, but the cost of money has continued to keep up, and the Federal reserve system has been allowed to make profits that are unjustifiable. They have invested these profits in monumental buildings which they are using in many cases for other purposes than those of banking. Now, since we have not had the foresight or the vision to enact legislation which will enable the business people of the country to borrow money on reasonable terms, the question arises whether we are still going to adhere to the policy that is permitting excessive profits to be made by the Federal reserve system, or whether we have sufficient patriotism to see not only the present but the future needs of the country. Every time the banks charge higher interest rates those increased rates are reflected in the cost of transacting business, and it should be our business to do everything that legislation can do to prevent the continuation of what I believe to be a very unjust practice. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I am much gratified to have the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] express himself so strongly in favor of the view which I have long held, namely, that the affairs of the Federal reserve bank should be handled from the standpoint of service instead of profit. The gentleman is correct. The original intention was that they should be banks of service and not banks of profit. I have been charged as the author of the original limitation of a 6 per cent dividend that they might earn. I will say to the House that the situation is such now that I do not think there is going to be the enormous profit in the future that some gentlemen think. If the gentleman has an amendment to the Federal reserve act that he can get by the administration leaders, I assure him he will have the hearty cooperation of myself and the other Democratic members of the committee, and some of the Republican members. That is neither here nor there, however. We are not now undertaking to do what some gentlemen think we are. I think gentlemen will remember that the thing that precipitated the law which we are amending to-day was extravagant expenditures in Chicago, New York, and elsewhere for these buildings. I condemned it then and I condemn it now. I do not say it boastfully, but those who differ with me have bitterly accused me of being responsible for this restrictive statute which you are about to amend. That is, we took away from the Federal Reserve Board the right to fix the cost of buildings whenever they wish to expend above $250,000. Congress having taken that discretion away from the board, then the duty devolves upon Congress to exercise that discretion and meet the responsibility, does it not? Has Congress done that? Ever since that was enacted there has been some contention about it, and we find that in the instance of some of these branch banks the $250,000 limitation, as ruled by the attorney of the board, will not permit them to erect a building that is necessary, if you include the vaults and the fixtures. The attorney for the board holds that they are a part of the limitation. All on earth this does is to exclude the cost of the permanent vaults and fixtures from the limitation of $250,000. I will tell you why I have agreed to this compromise. I know that one of these branch banks, which is powerful in this House, will have back of it one of the strongest blocs in this House, and I believe that if you do not make this correction in the general limitation there will be a logrolling process in the next House that will cause branch bank buildings to be erected all over this country at at least twice the sum that is fixed in the limit in this bill. I believe it is an economy proposition, because we simply meet the one objection that is raised and we still hold the building proper down to $250,000. There is a difference in the cost of vault requirements.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the limitation is all right. I think the legislation which limited the amount which should be put into a building was beneficent, but while we are going on with this we ought to think about the other thing and pass proper legislation.

Mr. WINGO. I will say to the gentleman that we are working on that. We have that very question pending in hearings on a bill, and probably some legislation along that line may be reported in some of these bills that amend the Federal reserve act.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. May I ask the gentleman when it will be reported? We have had two years on it, have we not?

Mr. WINGO. On what?

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. On what the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. WINGO. No; the bill I referred to just passed the Senate the other day.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Oh, I am talking about the principle; I am not talking about the bill.

Mr. WINGO. Of course, my colleague ought to be familiar with what I have been doing along that line. I have been abused enough in my State for the fight I have made to limit extravagant expenditures by these banks, and I have agreed to the pending bill for the sole reason that I am convinced it will prevent larger sums in specific building bills for each branch passed separately.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Can the gentleman give me any information as to when he expects to call up the validating tax proposition conference report?

Mr. McFADDEN. The conferees have been working diligently on that proposition. The gentleman realizes what a complex problem it is. The conferees are making considerable headway. We had hoped to get the matter before the House to-day, and I regret exceedingly that it has not been possible to do so. I believe that within a few days the conferees will complete their work and report an agreement to the House.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman will not call it before the first of next week?

Mr. McFADDEN. I would think that it will be physically impossible to call it up before that time.

Mr. SNELL. I would like to have an understanding that we could have a reasonable notice before it will be called up.

Mr. McFADDEN. I shall be very glad to cooperate with the gentleman in that respect and to see that sufficient notice is given so that those interested may be here when the report is called up.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me to offer an amendment to a section of the bill and to offer a new section?

Mr. McFADDEN. I shall be very glad to yield to the gentleman to make an explanation, but I do not want to lose the floor.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. I have never seen explanations yet cut very much ice here. It is an amendment that I desire to offer.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman has not consulted me concerning his amendment, and I do not know what he proposes, and we are anxious to expedite the passage of this measure.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. All I want to know is whether the gentleman will or will not.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman is opposed to the passage of the bill, as I understand it.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Then the gentleman understands something that I have not said, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. McFADDEN. Is the gentleman in favor of the bill?

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. I want to offer an amendment to the present bill, and I want to offer a new section to it. All I want to do is to get an answer to my question. I have no way of having the gentleman do it.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman is aware of the parliamentary situation. If I yield to the gentleman to offer an amendment I lose the floor.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. I do not want the floor.

Mr. McFADDEN. I am willing that the gentleman shall discuss his amendment.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. That is not what I want to do. I do not want to fire blank out in the air. All I want to do is to offer an amendment to strike out one word in the bill, and then I want to offer a new section to the bill. I do not want to discuss it. I am not playing to the galleries, and I have no disposition to do that.

Mr. McFADDEN. I regret that I can not yield to the gentleman for an amendment. I would have been very glad to discuss the matter with the gentleman had he come to me and given me an opportunity, but in the absence of any information in respect to his amendment I do not feel that I can yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. I have trotted around here like a poor boy at a cash auction for a good while, trying to find out what you are going to do about this. Nobody told me that the gentleman was going to take up this matter to-day, except what I found from the Record. I realize that I ought to have gone to the gentleman, but I went to him so much that I did not want to worry him any more.

Mr. CHINBLUM. I do not think that anybody was notified.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania as to the interpretation of the language. The bill provides—

If the cost of the building proper, exclusive of the vaults, permanent equipment, furnishings, and fixtures is in excess of $250,000.

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes; the cost of the building proper shall not exceed $250,000.

Mr. BEGG. Will it be interpreted that the four walls are the cost of the building?

Mr. McFADDEN. Not exclusively. It will include the foundation and building proper. We interpret that the intention of the Congress was to limit "lavish expenditure" for bank buildings.

Mr. BEGG. Well, do the inside fixtures represent the excess of $250,000?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. One further question. Is it not entirely possible to raise the limit of cost of these buildings four or five hundred thousand dollars?

Mr. McFADDEN. Well, I hardly think so. What we are trying to do is to put on the brakes but at the same time to permit adequate banking quarters without extravagance.

Mr. BEGG. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's idea, but I am fearful that he is taking the brakes off.

Mr. McFADDEN. I do not believe so. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 35 minutes remaining.

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. APPLEBY].

Mr. APPLEBY. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives, as a member of the Banking and Currency Committee I favor the amendment now before this body. Prior to the adoption of the bill limiting the costs of branch Federal reserve bank buildings the sky was the limit for such buildings. I want to concur in the statement of Mr. MADDEN that the Federal reserve system has been earning too much money and, in my opinion, returning too little to the stockholders of the Federal reserve banks. To remedy that situation, last July I introduced an amendment to the Federal reserve act, calling for a 50-50 division of the net profits of the system, this equal division to be paid in addition to the 6 per cent now received by the member banks.

When you take into consideration that banks who are now members of the Federal reserve system in the various cities and towns are the only people who ever put any actual money in the Federal reserve system, they are entitled to more than $6,000,000 dividends out of the $60,000,000 earned by the Federal reserve system in 1921.

I further believe that the rates of rediscounting can be further reduced as suggested by Mr. MADDEN.

I am hopeful that my bill will become incorporated in the Capper bill. Hearings upon both bills are now being held by the Committee on Banking and Currency. Should the measure be reported to the House I will present facts and figures to show that a more equitable division of the net profits should be made between the Federal reserve system and the individual stockholders of that system.

I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. McFADDEN. I move the previous question on the bill and amendment.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves the previous question on the bill and amendment, and the gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of order there is no quorum present. It is clear there is no quorum present.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and three Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF GOLOMBIEWSKI V. RAINEY.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Elections No. 2.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LUCE, from the Committee on Elections No. 2, submitted a report on the contested-election case of John Golombiewski v. John W. Rainey from the fourth congressional district of the State of Illinois. (Rept. No. 1500.)

The SPEAKER. Referred to the House Calendar.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, several days ago when the time came for the appointment of conferees on the legislative appropriation bill the name of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] was suggested by the Speaker for one of those positions. At that time the gentleman from Massachusetts was ill and in consequence absent from the House. Because of that fact I was put on in his place. As the gentleman has now sufficiently recovered to be present and as the conferees have never met, I wish to resign for the purpose that he may be put on in my stead.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] resigns as a conferee on the legislative bill, and the Chair appoints the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] in his place.

AMENDMENT OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas moves to recommit to the Committee on Banking and Currency with instructions to report back to the House with the following amendment:

"No Federal reserve bank shall have authority to enter into a contract or contracts for the erection of any branch bank building of any kind or character, or to authorize the erection of any such building if the cost of the building proper, exclusive of furnishings and fixtures, is in excess of $250,000: Provided, That nothing herein shall apply to buildings now under construction: And provided further, That no Federal reserve bank shall have authority to enter into any contract or contracts for the erection of buildings for its head offices or principal banks the total cost of which shall exceed 15 per cent of its capital stock and surplus."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order—

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the motion to recommit.

In the first place, this is a Senate bill, and not a House bill, and in the second place—

The SPEAKER. Why does that make any difference?

Mr. WINGO. It is not a motion to commit but to recommit.

Mr. McFADDEN. And in addition, Mr. Speaker, it would change the whole basis from a fixed basis to a percentage basis and might mean under such conditions the expenditure of a million or two million dollars on a branch bank building.

The SPEAKER. It does not seem to the Chair that that would be the case.

Mr. WINGO. Here is the situation, Mr. Speaker, that I think the Chair has not yet grasped: Here is a Senate bill on the Speaker's table. The motion of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PARKS] is to recommit it to a committee that has never had it. He does not offer a motion to refer it to that committee. The procedure is clear by which you can handle a Senate bill on the Speaker's table when it comes up.

Now let us get down to the merits of the amendment. There are two ways by which you can handle this question of limitation. The gentleman raises the very question now that has caused all the confusion. Those of us who have been opposed to extravagant expenditures have fought the percentage basis. Now, the rule in the pending bill is a uniform rule, applying to all buildings, with a fixed limit in dollars. The gentleman in addition includes an ingeniously drawn provision that affects that. This says that no building for a head office—this bill covers the branch offices, I mean the pending bill—shall be authorized to cost exceeding 15 per cent of the bank's capital stock. That changes the basis of existing law, which does not have the percentage basis in it, for this reason: Suppose you put it on a percentage basis. It would mean that one bank would have a building that could cost twice what another would cost. Which basis of limitation will you use? One is a strict uniform limitation, applying equally to all buildings. The other is a percentage basis, which would destroy uniformity, which is the object of the bill, and permit one bank to erect a building at one cost, which might be excessive, and another bank at another cost.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the last part of the gentleman's point of order is well taken and sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to recommit the bill with the following amendment: Page 1, line 10, after the word "proper" strike out the following: "exclusive of the cost of the vaults, permanent equipment, furnishings, and fixtures."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is the negative of the bill. That is the only new law in the bill. I assure the gentleman from Texas that that is true. That is the object of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. But there is now allowed furnishings and fixtures in the present law. This changes the present law to that extent.

Mr. WINGO. No. The present law does not mention that.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the present law confined to the sum of $250,000?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I reoffer my amendment, Mr. Speaker: On page 1, line 10, strike out the words "the cost of the vaults."

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Now you have got it. That is the very thing.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency with instructions to report the same back forthwith, with the following amendment: Page 1, line 10, strike out the words "the cost of the vaults."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to recommit the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 4, noes 150.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-three Members; a quorum is present. The "noes" have it. The motion to recommit is rejected. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 180, noes 7.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. McFADDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CREDITS AND REFUNDS.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move to take up the bill (H. R. 13775) to amend the revenue act of 1921 in respect to credits and refunds; and pending that, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] as to his wishes in regard to the allotment of time. I do not know whether the gentleman from Texas understood the bill I made a motion on.

Mr. GARNER. I did not. I understand it is in regard to exchanges. I thought the gentleman was going to call up the bill with respect to credits and refunds.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes. It is the bill (H. R. 13775) to amend the revenue act with respect to credits and refunds. There are a number of Members who want a little time on this bill. It is a very simple bill. I shall not need very much time for debate myself. I will ask the gentleman if he will agree on 30 minutes to a side?

Mr. GARNER. Is this what is known as the refunding bill?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman has in mind, perhaps, the amendment to the sinking fund act. It is not that. It is the one for refunding claims on taxes.

Mr. GARNER. What time does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. About 30 minutes on a side.

Mr. GARNER. All right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the general debate on this bill be limited to 30 minutes on a side. Is there objection?

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 13775.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] will take the chair. [Applause.]

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13775) to amend the revenue act of 1921 in respect to credits and refunds, with Mr. MADDEN in the chair.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, there is no occasion at this time to make any reference to the merits of the conditions which brought on the great coal strike of last summer. The fact remains that as a result of it there has been a tremendous shortage of coal all during the present winter. Undoubtedly the Members of the House are well aware of the method of distribution. The Pennsylvania Fuel Commission rated 60 per cent possible delivery to all customers based on the amount of fuel which they received during the past so-called coal year. The commission has been endeavoring to proceed upon that basis during the time that the coal has been mined since the conclusion of the strike. I think on the whole the mining industry has lived up to that percentage very well, because there have been very large supplies both of bituminous and anthracite coal mined during the past few months. The difficulty is that in the stress of weather we have recently been having in New England 60 per cent is not sufficient to prevent great suffering. But if that 60 per cent can be maintained we must in some way provide for the difference and get along until the emergency passes.

During the past few weeks I have had considerable to do with the Federal Fuel Distributor, both Mr. Spens and his successor, Mr. Wadleigh, and I want to take this occasion to say that I have never come in contact with Government officials more anxious to fill their respective positions and to accomplish the purpose for which they held those positions than have these two gentlemen. They have shown a disposition continuously to cooperate to relieve suffering. I have had numerous communications from my section of Massachusetts in reference to the shortage of the 60 per cent, and where information has been furnished me relative to the dealers who supplied customers previously and the number of cars that may have been shipped by those dealers, the Fuel Distributor here has been most anxious to see that the quantities go forward to keep up the 60 per cent. So I want to commend these gentlemen for their efforts in our behalf in this very serious time.

It seems to me all we can expect to do during the present winter is to avoid this very serious suffering, but we have a duty to perform in looking to the future to see that such a condition as now exists, particularly in New England this winter, should not be possible of repetition in the future. I do not stand for Government ownership, but I do believe in very strict control over such a great necessity as coal by the Government in order that there shall not be excessive prices, that the quantity shall be sufficient for our needs, and that the quality shall be properly regulated. I think the Government can go that far and that we ought to go that far.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does the gentleman think we ought to fix the price of coal?

Mr. TREADWAY. In that connection I would say that I have great hopes of the result of the efforts of the Fact Finding Commission appointed last fall by the President under authority of Congress. The chairman of that board is a very eminent engineer and inventor, John Hays Hammond, and associated with him is such a distinguished citizen as our former Vice President Marshall. I look to see the recommendations that that commission may make in its final report a basis on which we can legislate. As to whether or not it shall include the point to which the gentleman refers, I would prefer to await the report of that body before making my decision. Such high prices as to-day exist must be overcome, either by price fixing or direct control by some authoritative body. Present conditions require positive action.

The whole country is interested, and while our efforts at the present time are for a day-to-day supply, our next move must be to secure some permanent solution of this most grave problem.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Does not the gentleman think we ought to do something to bring down the exorbitant price of coal?

Mr. TREADWAY. I absolutely agree with the gentleman, but on that point we must consider this fact: Last autumn there was made a so-called fair price, ranging from $8 to $12.50 per ton at the mine for anthracite coal. In my remarks I am referring almost entirely to anthracite, because that is what we need in our country. The freight rate from the mining section to my home town is $4.54 a ton. Consequently if the fair price for the coal that is being shipped to us in Massachusetts as established by this impartial commission is $12.50 a ton and you add $4.54 to that as the freight rate, the price of coal at the present time among the dealers with whom I am familiar, I am glad to say, is not exorbitant and there is no profiteering in that particular section.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Could we not do something in reference to bringing down freight rates if the Interstate Commerce Commission does not?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; and we can also do something to bring down the rates which are established as a fair price for the coal at the mine. In my opinion, that is where the basic trouble lies, and I strongly hope, as I say, that the Fact Finding Commission will give us information of very great value for future legislation. Their report ought to be so comprehensive that Congress can readily enact legislation that will materially reduce prices.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Do not the mine price and the railroad rate together make this exorbitant charge?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly. There is nothing else that I know of. Of course, the price at the mine must include the necessary overhead in addition to the actual cost of mining.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Did not the gentleman in his investigation come to the conclusion that the inadequate car supply was one of the big features in this problem, and that the other was the failure of foreign lines to return their car supplies to the companies who own them where the fuel is produced?

Mr. TREADWAY. I think both suggestions of the gentleman from Alabama are undoubtedly correct as to a part of the difficulty.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In my opinion, those factors constitute the prime difficulty in the whole situation, and if the gentleman can evolve some system of legislation by which that difficulty can be corrected, he will be a great public benefactor.

Mr. TREADWAY. Undoubtedly that subject will be covered by the Fact Finding Commission. I have had some occasion to consult with them and they are deeply interested in the subject. They realize the importance of the position that they are holding and the need for thorough inquiry into the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes more to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, the difficulty is that the question is so tremendously intricate and there are so many different features involved that the people must exercise some patience. We can not accomplish this tremendous task overnight. We must have this inquiry made in proper manner, and the extent to which it goes will, of course, necessitate the consumption of considerable time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In line with what I said, I think it is proper to state that the coal mines in my district are idle at the present time, from one-third to one-half of the actual producing time, absolutely because we can not get cars.

Mr. ROGERS. If the gentleman will permit, the price of anthracite at the mines is $8.50. The price that we are paying in my part of the world is $18 to $22 a ton. I think the spread there indicates profiteering; and Mr. Wadleigh, whom the gentleman has very properly quoted, has admitted in writing to me that there is profiteering. Does not the gentleman think we ought to get after the coal profiteers and deal with that situation?

Mr. TREADWAY. I do. I thoroughly believe in what the gentleman says, and will gladly join in any efforts that can be made to reach profiteers, but I hold in my hand a statement which will correct my colleague to a certain extent. He says that the price of anthracite at the mine is $8.50. I have a complete list of all of the fair prices issued by Mr. Wadleigh, ranging from $8.50 to $12.50, and I should be very glad to insert it in the Record, if desired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman's colleague has stated that there has been profiteering in coal, and that the people of his district have to pay exorbitant prices for coal. The people in Indiana, in the coal regions, are complaining bitterly about the high prices paid for shoes. Has the gentleman made any investigation in respect to that?

Mr. TREADWAY. I can not go into that at this time, although possibly the profiteering in shoes may result from local dealers in the gentleman's section taking unfair advantage of his constituents.

The emergency fuel administrator in Massachusetts has recently sent out a statement, which I have in my hand, to the effect that the anthracite conditions are greatly improving in Massachusetts. I do not get any evidence of that, nor do I think my colleague [Mr. ROGERS] does. I think we are short all of the time, and it ought not to be represented to the people that conditions are improving.

Mr. ROGERS. The conditions are getting worse.

Mr. TREADWAY. One difficulty I have had is to get the necessary information from the dealers in coal at home on which to base efforts to cooperate with the Federal Fuel Distributor here.

Mr. CLAGUE. Can the gentleman give us any information when the Coal Commission will report?

Mr. TREADWAY. It has made one preliminary report already. I know nothing about any future report. The report deals largely with bituminous coal, which is not of as much interest to us in New England as is anthracite.

Extracts from the circular letter of the emergency fuel administrator in Massachusetts, to which I have referred, are as follows:

To all local emergency fuel distributors:

That the position throughout our Commonwealth as respects receipt of anthracite coal has been improving and continues to improve from week to week is best indicated by the following table. . . .

Our position, we feel confident, is better than many other anthracite-consuming States, and as good as any, and for this the public at large are to be strongly commended. . . .

With the anthracite position as we see it to-day in our Commonwealth plus the large amount of bituminous coal and other substitutes within our borders, so far as the fuel situation is concerned, there should be no unnecessary suffering.

The entire communication is very optimistic. The other side, directly from the people, is shown in an item appearing in the Pittsfield (Mass.) Eagle under date of January 30, which I insert herewith:

COAL SHORT IN THE CITY, SITUATION SERIOUS—EMERGENCY AS BAD AS IN WAR TIME, DISTRIBUTOR SAYS—ECONOMY IN USE URGED.

That the fuel situation in Pittsfield is as bad as it was in war time was asserted to-day by Simon England, acting fuel distributor.

Somehow or other, possibly because now and then a householder sees a ton of coal delivered at the house of his neighbor, the impression is abroad that there is an endless supply of hard coal in the city. The fact is that there are only a few carloads of the large sizes, he says, and some of the dealers have none at all. It may be only a question of time when the city will have to go on a soft-coal basis.

There is soft coal in Pittsfield, plenty of it, but numerous disadvantages and discomforts attend its use. A great many persons have something to do except to tend furnace all the time. But it is better than nothing—better than freezing. Mr. England urges that people who have hard coal should exercise the utmost economy in its use—make what they have go as far as they can. For four days past there have been no shipments of hard coal into the city and the outlook for the receipt of any considerable quantity is not great. Cooperation in making the limited quantity of hard coal go as far as it will is urged by the distributor.

Steps are being taken in an effort to ease the situation, which at the best is very bad. Meantime, everyone who has a pound of coal is asked to husband it as if it were treasure from Tutankhamen's tomb. It may not be necessary to ask persons who have their supply in to share, though this expedient has been suggested in cases of fuel shortages in the past.

Ashes should be sifted and the bits of salvaged coal used over again. Some householders are able to keep their furnaces going all day "just on cinders." Emergency requests are flowing in every day in ever-increasing volume and there are many distressing cases.

Yesterday I telegraphed to Mr. England asking if the article was correct, and this morning I received the following reply:

PITTSFIELD, MASS., February 1, 1923.

Hon. ALLEN T. TREADWAY,
Washington, D. C.:

Article in Tuesday's Eagle is correct and situation serious in Pittsfield. We have about three days' supply anthracite on hand. Your offer to assist is certainly appreciated by the people of Pittsfield. Will wire you at earliest possible moment the numbers of cars en route.

SIMON ENGLAND,
Emergency Fuel Administrator.

This information has already been communicated to Mr. Wadleigh, who assures me of prompt action through his office.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the Federal reserve banking system was one of the greatest legislative gifts given to the American people under the Wilson administration, for under it there will never be another financial panic. Yet there are growing evils now connected with it that must be controlled. These abuses form about the liveliest question there is in every district of the United States to-day, for there is very much complaint concerning the lavish expenditure of its money in wasteful extravagance by the Federal reserve banks. It was said that this money comes from the national banks. It comes out of the pockets of the borrowing people of the country. Mention was made of a Federal reserve bank bloc. If our inaction concerning these banks continues as it has been, and these abuses are not corrected, there will be another kind of bloc in the Congress before very many days.

On June 3 of this year we passed an amendment to the act limiting the cost of branch bank buildings to $250,000. That amendment had hardly gotten cold before these Federal banks have forced another amendment through this House to-day. Through a misapprehension of the facts, I imagine many Members voted for it, thinking it was a restriction rather than an enlargement, which it is. What does it say concerning the amendment passed on June 3? It now excludes the cost of vaults, it excludes the cost of permanent equipment, it excludes the cost of furnishing, it excludes the cost of fixtures. In addition to the $250,000 for the building proper there could be expended several hundred thousand dollars more for vaults, permanent improvements, furnishings, and fixtures. It is just one more enlargement of that restricted amendment that we passed on June 3.

The membership of this House could not get a chance to be heard on the proposition. The great Committee on Banking and Currency moved the previous question after yielding 10 or 15 or 20 minutes, possibly, in debate, and thereby closed the mouth of every Member of this House and gave us no chance to discuss the matter. That is just the way that every single amendment concerning the power of the Federal reserve banks is passed through this House. The time ought soon to come when this committee brings its measures upon this floor, when it will see fit to give the membership of the House a chance to properly consider, discuss, and dissect and understand the provisions of the proposed legislation, so that they may find out whether they are voting to restrict or enlarge the powers now possessed. At home in my district the people are waking up on this proposition. The immense profits which are being made by this system, which are being distributed in big salaries and in the elaborately extravagant fixtures, furnishings, and buildings are not in accordance with the desire of the people generally over the United States. They are waking up on the proposition. You are going to hear from them in Republican as well as Democratic districts, because it is not a partisan question. It is a question concerning which the people of this country are vitally interested. They have a right to have their representatives on this floor heard when these measures are passed day after day.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER].

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair has the time, the gentleman from Iowa has only 12 minutes remaining.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, we did not have a unanimous-consent agreement. Objection was made to that. Under the rules the gentleman from Iowa will have an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has been assuming that the time was equally divided.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; I control the time entirely, with the understanding that I shall give the gentleman from Texas what time he desires.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman, the Ruhr Valley situation, which I am going to discuss here to-day, is one which has been very much before the public mind, not only of this country but of Europe and the entire world, for the last several weeks. The executive committee of the American Legion—representing a fair cross section of the men who fought—recently adopted a resolution embodying, in my opinion, the sentiments of 90 per cent of those who met our late enemies, the Germans, on the battle fields of France, and I desire to read into the Record, for the information of the House and of the country, the resolution to which I have referred:

Resolution passed by the national executive committee, American Legion, at Indianapolis, Ind., U. S. A., January 15-16, 1923.

Whereas the Peace Conference following the World War and participated in by representatives of the majority of the nations of the earth, including the United States, determined, among other things, that Germany should pay certain reparations; and

Whereas on April 27, 1921, the Reparation Commission in execution of article 233 of the peace treaty fixed the total amount of reparations due from Germany to all the Allies at 132,000,000,000 gold marks, which Germany, on May 11, 1921, accepted unconditionally, and France by agreement of the Allies was to receive 52 per cent of all reparations awarded, including certain deliveries of coal, lumber, and other payment in kind; and

Whereas within a short time after the acceptance of the reparations award Germany fell in arrears in the payment of money and in the delivery of material as provided by the treaty, and the people of Germany began to send out of the country gold, securities, and other forms of wealth and to seriously impair if not wreck the whole German financial system for the purpose of avoiding payment, and by evasion, trickery, and sundry devices sought to deprive France of the awards made by the Peace Conference and accepted by Germany, was on January 10, 1923, in default in the delivery of coal and lumber; and

Whereas for the purpose of securing compliance with the terms of the peace treaty France has now occupied certain territory in the Ruhr Valley; Therefore be it

Resolved by the national executive committee of the American Legion in session in the city of Indianapolis, United States of America, this 15th day of January, 1923, That the action of France in so occupying said territory was and is justified; that she is endeavoring by the only effective means to collect a debt which the majority of the nations of the earth have decreed she is justly and properly entitled to; that we approve her course in the premises and wish her success to the end that the wrongs endured and the damages suffered by her may to some extent be compensated, the fruits of victory enjoyed, and the war stay won; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, to the presiding officers of the Senate and House of Representatives, and to the French ambassador at Washington.

Whereas the youth of America in 1917 and 1918 offered all they had to bring peace, justice, and happiness to the world, and in that effort cooperated with their stricken allies; and

Whereas, the lives and health of thousands of American boys were given to that holy cause; and

Whereas the peoples of the world are now torn and bleeding from the effects of the war and the consequent fears, distrusts, hates, and misunderstandings; and

Whereas the ex-service men of America still long to restore to the world peace, justice, and happiness, the things for which they fought and their comrades died; and

Whereas there remains in the heart of every ex-service man the memory of friendship and common service with our allies and also a desire to be generous to a defeated foe: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That the national executive committee of the American Legion assembled at Indianapolis, Ind., expresses its hope that the cause of justice and world tranquility for which their comrades' lives were sacrificed may continue to the good of our great country, and we respectfully request our Government to lend its aid as its good judgment may dictate to abate the world's crisis and assist in the establishment of peace on earth and good will to men.

Now, in this question of the so-called Ruhr invasion, I recognize the fact that this House as such is not charged with the control of our foreign affairs. I recognize that those powers are primarily vested in the Executive, who, in consultation with the upper House or Senate, must make all decisions. Notwithstanding that fact, however, Mr. Chairman, the Members of this House are deeply and vitally interested in all questions which affect international justice and the peace of the world. About 10 days ago, I believe, on January 20, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], who from time to time makes very interesting talks here on matters affecting government and politics, from a Socialist's standpoint, arose on the floor of this House to discuss this same situation. At that time the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] asked the gentleman from New York this question:

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman said that this country ought to do something. What would the gentleman have this country do?

Mr. LONDON. I would have the American Congress express in kind but solemn words the desire that the invaded territory be evacuated. I would ask that the President be instructed to mediate. I would urge the convocation of an international economic conference. I believe that, in the name of the joint sacrifices made by the United States in the war, France owes a respectful hearing to the American Congress. Because France relied for sustenance in her distress on Czarism, it was not Czarism that saved her; it was the American democracy that finally saved her.

Now, gentlemen, I do not deny the latter part of the gentleman's statement. It was the American Republic, backed by the American people, which finally threw its weight to the side of the Allies, which gained the final victory, and for that reason if for no other America is vitally interested in seeing that the war stays won. [Applause.] I know the Ruhr area very well, almost as well as I know the section around Washington. I have been there on sundry occasions, both as an American soldier and as a civilian, and just a little over a year ago I was in the Ruhr Valley from Bochum through Essen to Ruhrort, as well as in other large industrial towns in that area. It can be truly said that the Ruhr Valley is the heart of German industry, and if Germany is to pay the reparations to which she is committed and for which France and her allies have suffered it is to be expected that they will largely be extracted from this territory. Now, what is the situation? Four years after the war we find that the Germans have paid the French less than $2,000,000,000 gold on reparation. We find that the French Government has spent almost eight billion in the reconstruction of their devastated Provinces, and the work is far from completed, all of which, or practically all, has been raised by internal taxation within the French Republic, after four years of war in which they were bled white in men and resources. Let it be remembered that France lost the flower of her manhood—1,500,000 in round numbers—and that her fairest and richest Provinces were plundered, wrecked, and ravaged from Belfort, near the Swiss border, to the sea. This does not take into account her wounded and mutilated, the human wreckage of a war which Germany and not France had provoked. "On n'oubliera pas"—One can not forget. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINEBERGER. Briefly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman said that Germany had already paid 2,000,000,000 in gold. Did the gentleman mean in gold?

Mr. LINEBERGER. I mean in gold dollars. I am speaking in dollars. I have translated the amount into dollars.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman mean those were paid in gold marks, in the actual gold?

Mr. LINEBERGER. No; I did not mean they were actually paid in gold marks. Most of this has been paid in kind, as the gentleman well knows; coal and various other commodities are included.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Three hundred and fifty thousand cattle and hogs and 150,000 cars, and much other property more than two years ago.

Mr. LINEBERGER. But she is still far from reconstituting the loss which she imposed upon France by her four years' invasion. The reparations obligations have been reduced several times and are now 132,000,000,000 gold marks, or about 31,500,000,000 American dollars, for all the Allies. This is a reduction of over two-thirds of the original amount, and still Germany tries to evade. France only gets about half of the reparations.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINEBERGER. Briefly.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will say when the gentleman used the term "gold dollars" he meant the equivalent in gold marks?

Mr. LINEBERGER. Yes; the gold mark is worth about 24 cents. Now, the gentleman from New York not only delivered an address here on the floor of this House but he is quite active elsewhere. He is certainly within his privileges, if he sees fit, in making addresses elsewhere, and I said he was quite active, and I quote from the Washington Times of January 29, 1923, which says:

MEYER LONDON, Socialist Congressman from New York, will speak at a meeting of the club to-night on the invasion of Ruhr—

Which news item referred to an address which he delivered before the Washington Y. M. C. A. on that date.

In Europe last year I was quite surprised to find that the addresses in Congress of the gentleman from New York, for whom personally the Members of this body have nothing but sympathetic regard although they differ vitally with the theories which he advocates, were translated into German and into Russian, and that they were used as propaganda from Berlin to Moscow, and I have no doubt but that the address which he recently delivered on the Ruhr, delivered from the floor of this House will go out ultimately in similar form, and I do not desire that people in this country or in France, Germany, Russia, or elsewhere in Europe shall for one moment believe that there is any considerable body of American Congressmen who adhere to or who concur with the ideas presented by the gentleman from New York on the Ruhr situation. [Applause.] I want to say to you gentleman, that the large industrialists of to-day in the Ruhr were the leading imperialists of yesterday and they are still imperialistic and monarchistic at heart. As I have been able to judge them from my conversation and contact with them in Europe should they succeed in evading their reparations obligations and thereby cause the French effort in the Ruhr to end in failure, I have no doubt but that their prestige would be so enhanced with the German people and with the German Government, that a reversion to a monarchy with very chauvinistic inclinations, would ensue in the very near future.

It shows me that we may have every reason to be interested in a larger sense in this proposition; at least, in its final outcome. However, I do not want to be misunderstood or misquoted and I want to say that I am indeed proud that our administration—and I do not speak of the administration as a Republican administration or in any partisan sense—the administration which has handled the foreign affairs of this country for the whole American people has taken the attitude which it has taken, to wit, hands off. We should take no action whatever which could be interpreted by our late enemies, with whom we are now at peace, to encourage them in any manner whatsoever in the belief that we will assist them in avoiding their obligations. For we will not do so. Of this I am sure. I am also of the opinion that we should take no attitude whatever to encourage or discourage France. Hers is a peculiar problem and she understands best in what direction her vital interests lie. Her old comrades in arms follow the outcome with sympathetic interest, but the American Government, at peace with both nations to the controversy, is pursuing a course which meets with the approval of its citizens, no matter what their personal judgment or sentiment may be as to the merits of the issues at stake. [Applause.] Unhindered, let our old friend and ally, France, go her way, and if she can collect the money, so far as I am concerned, I say, "Bon voyage, and good luck." [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINEBERGER. I prefer not to yield. I have only a short time left. If France can collect her just and lawful debt of Germany, Americans and all others who believe in justice as an immutable foundational of principle in the universe should rejoice, according to my way of thinking, at least; and I want to place in the RECORD an editorial from the January 29, 1923, issue of the New York Times which reflects a view which should not be disregarded in shaping our present or future attitude in this matter. The editorial is as follows:

WHERE OUR SOLDIERS STAND.

[From the New York Times, Monday, January 29, 1923.]

While cautious statesmanship is neutral or antagonistic as regards the occupation of the Ruhr by France to compel Germany to make a reparation settlement, the American soldier is declaring himself as one entitled to be heard. He thinks about the economic campaign of the French just as he fought in battle, and he speaks out in the spirit of the brave old alliance. A few days ago Col. Alvin M. Owsley, national commander of the American Legion, in an address at Atlantic City, reminded his hearers in the Morris Guards Armory that France was trying to collect the debt that public opinion in America at the time of the Paris conference decided should be paid. He might have added that France was willing to take less than the terms of the bond. Did the American soldiers who fought in France, and by their might and valor brought about the victory, condemn the occupation of the Ruhr? The Legion commander answered for them, and it may be assumed that he knew their sentiments:

"I announce to America that the heart and hand of the American Legion remain with the French Republic."

It is significant that this positive utterance "aroused storms of applause." Colonel Owsley then declared: "The trouble is that the enemy has not heard from America since we left the fields of battle." That feeling seems to be spreading through the country, in the sense that men think Germany should be made to pay France to the limit of ability. The seizure of the Ruhr is an attachment of the goods of the debtor. It can be dissolved only by a bona fide agreement to settle and by prompt payments on account. Another soldier, greatly honored and esteemed, Maj. Gen. John F. O'Ryan, of the Twenty-seventh New York Division, has also come out strongly for France. In a talk to the National Guard Association of New York he used this plain language:

"The manner in which the facts are at times misrepresented and obscured tends to lead the unthinking and the unstable to shift their loyalty from the cause of France, which was our cause, to the cause of political expediency or of business opportunity."

It was General O'Ryan's deliberate opinion that, pay what they might, the Germans could never expiate the crimes they committed against liberty and painfully accumulated property in the four years of war, and that they could never make amends for the anguish and suffering they had caused the world. The following were timely words:

"In considering the present policy of France it is well to remind ourselves what some persons are beginning to forget, namely, that the destruction was not wholly a by-product of the waging of battle. Very largely the ruin of French industry and agriculture was the result of a fiendish policy of deliberate and scientific destruction which literally tore the property to pieces. We saw these things with our own eyes."

France herself has expended billions of francs in the work of reconstruction; Germany comparatively little, in spite of her solemn engagements. France is not trying to wring an indemnity from Germany but to make collections under the name of reparations to save herself from ruin. That the German armies endeavored to wreck France industrially during the war is a historic fact. Judging from the context, General O'Ryan seems to have been speaking for the ex-service men and for the whole country when he said:

"In the present phase of the struggle our help is equally needed and our responsibility would seem to be equally great. Whether we are in complete or partial accord with all that France is doing, whether we are barren of sympathy for Germany, or would forgive and forget, the truth is that our active participation is essential at this time."

Since France took over the Ruhr the German Government has lived in hope of enlisting the moral influence of America to defeat the purpose of the French. The moral influence of the American soldiers it has not reckoned with, but that influence will evidently be thrown into the scale on the side of France. The war will not have been finally won until Germany is held to the reparation debt, admits the claim, and puts her back into the work of clearing it off.

Her defense of civilization during those four dark years, when she was practically bled white, at least entitles her to some sympathetic consideration. [Applause.] The quiet serenity, the moderate attitude, the admirable efficiency with which France has proceeded to her unwelcome task has been the admiration of all who appreciate the obstacles with which she is confronted. I know it is fashionable just now to say bitter things about France, but the ex-service men who met the Germans on the battle fields of France do not care to be fashionable.

Germany says she can not pay for the ruin she has wrought, but meantime her profiteers and munition makers are rolling up their billions. France says collect from these men. Germany says she can not do it. France says very well I will help you. That is what the occupation of the Ruhr Basin means. It is not an invasion of Germany. It is the serving of a writ on Stinnes, Thyssen, Krupp von Bohlen, and others of their kind. It is dangerous, but every emergency measure involves danger. America prays for a peaceful result.

France has waited four years, taxing its people four times as much as Germany taxed its people.

So far it is evident, however, that the French have carried out their plans with efficiency and quietness and with a sort of determined serenity. They have placed their troops in positions of strategic advantage without flaunting their military forces. It is reported that the French are concerned to discover the extent and obstinacy of the German passive resistance. There has been little or no violence. Within the first week the only casualties reported were not the result of attacks, primarily, by Germans upon the French, but of riots between two German factions which the French soldiers had to bring to an end. Up to January 23 the casualties apparently have been less than have occurred in many a raid of American prohibition officials upon moonshiners or bootleggers.

If Europe is short of coal, it is not the fault of the French who occupy the Ruhr, but it is the fault of the Germans who deliberately put out of business the coal region of Lens, besides destroying industrial machinery of enormous value.

People who are saying that France is going to get nothing out of this adventure in the Ruhr Valley have failed to indicate how much France was getting out of the alternative she has been trying for the last four years.

In conclusion, I want to sum up the situation as I see it. It has been clear that if the damage were not thus repaired, France and not Germany would lose the war.

Yet it has been equally patent for many months that Germany was not paying and did not mean to pay for the damage she had done, and that if the Allies had laid upon German shoulders a burden beyond German capacity, it was equally plain that the Germans were prepared to avoid and evade all burden so far as it was humanly possible. It was also manifest that the Germans relied upon the United States and upon Great Britain to prevent the French from collecting war reparations.

So far France has expended $8,000,000,000 upon her devastations and war pensions and Germany has paid her not over a quarter of this amount. It will be necessary for France to expend several more billions upon her reconstruction before she can house the people who are still living in temporary shacks or barracks after four years of peace.

In this situation, what is the position of France? If Germany does not pay eventually, French taxpayers will be burdened with a debt of some ten or twelve billions growing out of German devastations and the care of French soldiers crippled and mutilated during the war. Germany, by contrast, has no devastations, and if she escapes paying reparations will, in addition, avoid a foreign debt, while France remains bound to pay some seven billions to her allies of the war for loans.

The treaty of Versailles provided that France should be reimbursed for her losses of civilian property, for the destruction due to German invasion and occupation, and in addition for the costs of war pensions. I am going to discuss this whole aspect in a moment, but now I desire to make clear one fact. The choice for France was not, as seems in America to be assumed, between reasonable payment—that is, German payment of sums which might be regarded as possible—and a sterile insistence upon sums out of the question. The choice of France was between the occupation of German territory, which is richly productive, with the possibility of collecting something, and a continuation of the present situation, where practically nothing is paid by Germany.

It is a profound mistake to argue that France was presented with an alternative and that she chose the less advantageous course. No proposal was made to France either by Great Britain or the United States, much less by Germany, which would give her even the slightest assurance of receiving sums which were in any sense adequate, while falling within the four corners of German capacity.

It is more likely, I believe, that French occupation may lead the Germans, and particularly the industrial and financial magnates, to back down and force their Government to make reasonable proposals accompanied by satisfactory guarantees. In that case the French occupation may be terminated without great delay and with no real material loss. This is what the French themselves hope for and profess to expect.

Undoubtedly this might have been the outcome had the United States not wavered in interest and had the British loyally supported French policy. But the American and British courses have manifestly encouraged the German to resist rather than to pay. And it seems to me, on the whole, not very likely that there will be any satisfactory German proposal, and, therefore, that we are in for a long French occupation, but it is not France's fault—the fault lies elsewhere in Europe.

The trouble is that some Americans and the British actions have manifestly encouraged the Germans to resist and to refrain from making any such proposals. And it would seem that, for the moment at least, Germany will continue this policy of passive resistance. As for an international conference, it would consider only the question of German payments, for the French will not now consent to leave the Ruhr until Germany provides the necessary guarantees for future reparations payments.

To those who are not familiar with, or who have forgotten, what France suffered at the hands of a victorious Germany in 1871 I would recommend that they read "La dernière classe" (The Last Class) and "Mon Village" (My Village), both classics of their kind.

I remind you of the sacred declaration of the Alsatian and Lorraine deputies at Bordeaux at the moment when Alsace and Lorraine were torn from the bleeding side of France and ruthlessly annexed to monarchical Germany.

The oath which they took, thank God, has been vindicated and the impassioned words then spoken will ring down through the centuries. These words which are immortal to every patriotic Frenchman, are as follows:

Nous jurons, tant pour nous que pour nos enfants et leur descendants de revendiquer éternellement le droit des Alsaciens et des Lorrains de rester membres de la Nation française.

Which freely translated says—

We pledge, not only for ourselves but for our children and their descendants, to revindicate for all time the right of the Alsaciens and the Lorrains to remain members of the French nation.

Forty-seven years later this pledge was revindicated, and the great French nation, sober and temperate in victory as in defeat, has won its right to live its own life without forever shuddering in the shadow of German militarism and German aggression. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] is recognized.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be notified at the expiration of 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I shall confine my remarks entirely to the bill which is before the House. This bill and some others which will follow it are all bills which are recommended by the Treasury Department. They are designed primarily to aid in the collection of the revenues, and some of them are very important in the way of increasing the revenues of the Government.

The particular bill that we have now before us is partly, and perhaps mostly, in the interest of the taxpayers, although to a certain extent it is in the interest of the Treasury. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the explanation given in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, which is found in the report, is as good as any that can be made, and I will ask that the Clerk read it in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 13, 1923.

HON. WILLIAM R. GREEN,

Acting Chairman, Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. GREEN: I have your letter of January 12, requesting any comments that I may care to offer with reference to a bill (H. R. 13775) to amend the revenue act of 1921 in respect to credits and refunds.

The proposed bill amends section 252 of the revenue act of 1921 in two respects: First, by providing that a refund or credit of income, war-profits or excess-profits taxes may be made if claim therefor is filed by the taxpayer within one year from the time the tax was paid even though not filed within five years from the time the return was due, and second, by providing that where a tax is erroneously or illegally collected from a withholding agent the refund shall be made to the withholding agent unless the amount of such tax was actually withheld by the withholding agent.

Section 252 of the revenue act of 1921 provides that no credit or refund of income, war-profits or excess-profits taxes shall be allowed after five years from the date when the return was due unless before the expiration of such five years a claim therefor is filed by the taxpayer. Section 3228 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by section 1315 of the revenue act of 1921, provides that a claim for the refunding or crediting of any internal-revenue tax erroneously or illegally collected must be presented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue within four years after the payment of such tax. The present ruling of the Treasury Department is that section 252 of the revenue act of 1921 and section 3228 of the Revised Statutes should be read together, and that a refund or credit of income, war-profits or excess-profits taxes erroneously or illegally collected may be made if claim therefor was filed within four years after the tax was paid although not within five years after the return was due. The necessity for a provision allowing the filing of a claim within a given period after the tax is paid, even though not within five years after the return was due, is apparent. In the case of an additional assessment of income, war-profits or excess-profits taxes after the expiration of the five-year period from the time when the return was due, which is permissible in cases where the taxpayer has waived his rights under the statute of limitations, such assessment would be final when made and the taxpayer would be barred from filing a claim for refund even to form the basis for a suit at law for the recovery of the taxes paid. The existing ruling of the Treasury Department, allowing a taxpayer to file a claim within four years after the tax is paid even though not within the five-year period after the return was due, is of very doubtful legality, and consequently it is deemed advisable to clarify the situation by means of legislation, and provide unequivocally that a claim for refund or credit may be considered by the department if filed within a given period after the tax was paid even though not within five years from the time the return was due.

For the reasons stated above I approve the proposed bill amending the revenue act of 1921 both as to form and as to substance.

Yours very truly,

A. W. MELLON, Secretary.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the committee will see from the reading of this letter that this bill applies only to claims for refund that are made more than five years after the taxes become due. That is, in other words, so far as anything that the Treasury has before it at the present time the bill applies only to taxes for the year 1917 that became due in 1918, as to which the five-year limitation is now running against the Government and also running against the taxpayers. Now, there are some of those claims that are still unsettled.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. Can the gentleman give us any plausible explanation as to why these claims for 1917 are still unsettled, and why there is such a vast number of them as there appears to be?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. My understanding is that there is no very great number at the present time. They have nearly finished auditing those for 1917.

Mr. BURTNESS. I take it for granted that the gentleman has about as many inquiries as the usual Member of Congress has, as to claims arising out of that very year, from his constituents. I understood it is quite a general experience of Members of Congress at this time to have many inquiries about the taxes of 1917.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In a moment. I have had some inquiries, and I presume the gentleman from North Dakota has had some; but that is only a small proportion of the great number that have been before the department.

I said that most of these claims are now audited. Some of them have been only audited recently, and for that reason they have not yet been settled. The situation is now in this form: A taxpayer, upon the audit being made, claims that the Government is still taxing him too much. Thereupon the Government says, "If you will waive the statute of limitations, we will examine your claim." The taxpayer, as a rule, consents, and then after the expiration of five years the Treasury officials say to him, "We have concluded your claim is not good; you must pay up at once." The taxpayer has then let the five-year limitation expire and he has no resource except under this ruling of the Treasury, which the Secretary of the Treasury says is of very doubtful legality. I do not think it is. My own opinion is that there is no foundation in the law for allowing the taxpayer four years further after the payment of the claim. But unless the Treasury so held, he would have no opportunity to contest what might be an illegal assessment. He would be compelled to pay at once or submit to execution and penalties, and have no chance of correction.

We think this would not be fair to the taxpayer. On the other hand, we think the present ruling of the Treasury puts the Treasury itself in a bad situation, because it gives the taxpayer four years after the five-year limitation in which to make a claim, and the matter might be prolonged in that way 9 or 10 years, which would be a bad thing for the Government.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman has covered what I wanted to ask him about.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. We have amended the law extending the limit five years, which would include 1917, would it not?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Would this preclude a man who filed his claim before 1920?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; nor would it help him. He would have a year, I will say to the gentleman, after the time he paid, as long as the claim comes up within the five-year period. This will not alter the situation. If it goes beyond the five-year period, he will have a year from the time he pays in which to make his claim, which the committee thought was sufficient.

Mr. LINTHICUM. For example, a man's taxes are being re-audited for 1917, and perhaps he will be found to owe more than were reported for 1917.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It may be that he has some set-off, some claim for a refund for that year. Will he be able to procure that refund for 1917 under this act?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is one of the important features of the act, that it permits such an application to be made, and one of the main purposes of the act was to give him a year within which to do that thing.

Mr. LINTHICUM. After the reaudit has been made, then he has an additional year in which to file his claim, as I understand.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. He is given a year from the time that he makes the payment. When the reaudit is made the Treasury will call upon him to settle up, but he will still have another year to ask for a refund.

Mr. LINTHICUM. He has already paid the taxes he thought he owed for 1917, and then the Government finds that he owes more taxes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. And he finds that he is entitled to some refund. Will he have a year after that additional payment in which to file his claim?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. He will, so far as that payment is concerned. That is one of the main purposes of the bill.

Mr. BURTNESS. Is not this a correct statement of the situation? He will have an additional year in which to file a claim for a refund of the additional amount which he pays at the behest of the Internal Revenue Department; but if the taxpayer believes that the payment he had already made was larger than it should have been he will not get an additional year in which to file a claim for refund of that portion which he had previously paid, erroneously in his contention. In other words, is not the situation simply this, that if prior to March 15 the department in auditing the 1917 returns finds that the taxpayer is owing $1,000 and it makes a demand for that amount, and the taxpayer in turn pays that $1,000 on the 1917 return, then under this bill he will have a year in which to file a claim for a refund of the $1,000; but if the taxpayer on verifying his return—checking it over, and so forth—finds that the auditor is wrong, at least as the taxpayer thinks, to the extent of $1,500 against him, he can not file a claim for the refund of that $1,500.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the payment is made within the five-year period, or a year before the expiration of the five-year period, this act will not help him any. It will not put him in any worse situation, but it will not help him any. He will have until the expiration of the five-year period in which to make his claim.

Mr. BURTNESS. The present situation is this, that if the department finds immediately prior to March 15 that the taxpayer should have paid a certain amount more than he did pay on the 1917 return, then without this legislation he has no recourse whatsoever, because he can not file a claim for a refund after the five-year period is over, and that is over on March 15.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BURTNESS. So in that case he is entirely up against it, and this legislation will give him relief in so far as the extra amount demanded by the department prior to March 15 is concerned, but will not give him any relief under the conditions referred to by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM], where the taxpayer thinks he had paid too much for 1917.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The committee did not see any reason why he should not file his claim within the five years, and so we did not think he needed any relief.

Mr. LINTHICUM. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirteen minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] 10 minutes, or as much of that time as he may desire.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, some gentlemen have asked me questions that bring to my mind a very important matter. There has been a great deal of criticism of the Treasury Department—and I am not certain that it is not just criticism—for the reason that they have not got their income and excess profits tax adjustments more nearly up to date. One of my colleagues asked me why we did not adopt an amendment requiring them to make the adjustment within one year after payment of the tax. One reason is because it would be physically impossible. Another reason is that the adjustments for the taxable year of 1917 are based upon the values of 1917, and the department has just recently got those values in shape. The officials say they can adjust these taxes very fast after they once get the valuation. I can understand that for the adjustment of the income tax and the excess-profit tax especially it is absolutely essential that the department should have the valuation basis to go upon, and they say they are going to bring them up to date. I asked the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury why he did not ask Congress for enough money to put 5,000 or 10,000 men to work, or whatever number were necessary, and he said he could not utilize them with any degree of economy on account of the fact that he had not obtained the valuation basis upon which to adjust them. So much for the apparent neglect of the Treasury Department.

This bill contains only these two propositions. One is that the taxpayer this month is undertaking to settle his adjustment for 1917. The Treasury Department is not satisfied to close the matter in a hurried manner without complete information, and the taxpayer is not satisfied. So the Treasury Department says, "If you will waive your rights we will give you another hearing and look into this matter." The taxpayer says, "All right." The Treasury Department says, "If you do not waive your rights we are going to assess you $100,000 or $1,000,000, as the case may be, with the right to present a claim later for a refund." Now, this amendment gives the taxpayer a year to come in and make his claim. If he paid under protest now he would possibly be barred on the 15th of March of this year, under a strict construction of the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have an impression that as far as the 1917 returns are concerned, if the Treasury Department had not made any reassessment prior to March 15, 1921, the department was barred from making any further levy. Some time ago—about two years ago—the Treasury Department sent around to all corporations blank forms requesting the taxpayer to waive the statute of limitations which would expire March 15 of that year. This bill, as I understand, will give the department the right to make a levy regardless of that.

Mr. GARNER. That is correct.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the gentleman will allow me, the statute of limitations will expire the 1st of March, 1923, for 1917.

Mr. STAFFORD. There was one return as to which the statute of limitations expired on March 15, and the department sent around blank forms asking the corporations to waive that. After that the department could only recover the tax they claimed through the courts and not by levy.

Mr. GARNER. First they were barred on the 1st of March, and we extended it to the 15th of March. Let me say to my friends on both sides of the House that this is a question of claims against the Government for erroneous taxes, taxes collected illegally, a contest as to how much the taxpayer should pay.

I do not believe that the membership of the Congress understands this situation with reference to the power that is in one man's hands. The Secretary of the Treasury literally commands hundreds of millions of dollars—money in his hands subject to his own discretion. I do not want to say that I believe for a moment that the Secretary of the Treasury would abuse that power. I do not think he would. The present Secretary of the Treasury is a man who would not abuse that privilege in any way. Nevertheless there has been considerable criticism about so much power resting in one man's hands. I know that Members of the House and members of the Ways and Means Committee are criticising the Treasury Department now, and we have asked for data for the purpose of ascertaining how much was remitted to certain corporations and individuals in this country. For instance, gentlemen will remember the other day seeing in the newspaper an account where Cudahy & Co. had recovered something like $2,000,000 of taxes erroneously paid. It is said that some taxpayer down in North Carolina has collected a very large amount.

All these matters, of course, are of rumor and are of a general nature. However, there ought to be created in the Treasury Department a sort of court to take the place of the present arrangement. As I understand the present arrangement, it is if a man has paid taxes erroneously or if taxes have been collected from him that ought not to have been collected he presents his claim to the Treasury Department. The Treasury Department then refers it through the Internal Revenue Bureau to a board composed of either seven or nine men, I forget which. It is true that they are high-class, well-informed gentlemen, so far as I know. That board hears the counsel representing the individual taxpayer or the corporation or the taxpayer himself without counsel, and there is a representative of the Internal Revenue Bureau present. They thrash the matter out and come to a conclusion as to how much additional tax shall be assessed or how much shall be refunded, as the case may be. That is a good arrangement, but it so happens that these young men who compose the appeal board do not stay there long. They go out and announce that they are going to practice law in Wall Street, in Chicago, or at some other place.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mostly in Washington.

Mr. GARNER. And a great many in Washington. One of them came to my desk to-day and announced that he was going to practice law in New York. What we need to handle claims arising out of about three billion dollars worth of taxes a year is a permanent court, which will have responsibility, and if necessary the tenure of office should be for a long term of years; and then, before this court, let matters between the taxpayers and the Government be adjusted. I am not sure that such a court should not have original jurisdiction with appeal direct to the Supreme Court. I mention this for the purpose of calling the attention of the Judiciary Committee to the advisability of having hearings on the problem with a view to presenting such legislation as will fit this pressing need. I do not want to provide the court through the Committee on Ways and Means. I would rather have the Judiciary Committee do that. However, if something is not done within a month or two after the next Congress meets I hope to call the matter to the attention of the House and to the Committee on Ways and Means with a view of establishing a permanent arrangement in the Treasury Department to settle these differences between the taxpayer and the Government.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. How does the gentleman suppose the amount of claims in a year of the character he is discussing now compares with the claims that go before the Customs Court?

Mr. GARNER. The amount of claims before the Court of Customs Appeals is insignificant compared with the claims I have mentioned, and yet we have a very important Court of Customs Appeals. I think it is very essential that we have such a court, and I think something of the kind ought to be done here. I am not one of those to pay attention to rumors here or there with reference to some one having had remitted $300,000, or some sum, this much or that much, through influence. One hears things of that kind all of the time. I do know that the present arrangement is not suitable for permanent retention. My friend from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] may say, "Why did not the Democrats do that when they enacted the original law?" When the original law was passed providing for an income tax nobody ever dreamed that we would have the enormous tax now being collected, and during the war we had little time in which to create permanent machinery. The time has come now, however, when there ought to be something done to solve the problem. The present arrangement is unsatisfactory, in my opinion. We do not want to put it into the power of one man, I do not care how honest he may be, to remit a million dollars of back taxes to any man or corporation. That is too much power to put into the hands of any one man, whether he be a Democrat or a Republican. There ought to be a court of seven or nine men, whose position should be permanent—men of the highest type that we can get. I rose to call this to the attention of the committee in connection with this amendment proposing to give additional time within which one can make claims against the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means disclose the status of the Bureau of Internal Revenue in respect to returns for back years?

Mr. GARNER. I do not think they do. My recollection is that in discussing that matter it was at an informal meeting of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. All time has expired; and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 252 of the revenue act of 1921 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 252. That if, upon examination of any return of income made pursuant to this act, the act of August 5, 1909, entitled 'An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes,' the act of October 3, 1913, entitled 'An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes,' the revenue act of 1916, as amended, the revenue act of 1917, or the revenue act of 1918, it appears that an amount of income, war-profits or excess-profits tax has been paid in excess of that properly due, then, notwithstanding the provisions of section 3228 of the Revised Statutes, the amount of the excess shall be credited against any income, war-profits or excess-profits taxes, or installment thereof, then due from the taxpayer under any other return, and any balance of such excess shall be immediately refunded to the taxpayer: Provided, That no such credit or refund shall be allowed or made after five years from the date when the return was due, unless before the expiration of such five years a claim therefor is filed by the taxpayer, or unless before the expiration of one year from the time the tax was paid a claim therefor is filed by the taxpayer: Provided further, That if upon examination of any return of income made pursuant to the revenue act of 1917, the revenue act of 1918, or this act, the invested capital of a taxpayer is decreased by the commissioner, and such decrease is due to the fact that the taxpayer failed to take adequate deductions in previous years, with the result that an amount of income tax in excess of that properly due was paid in any previous year or years, then, notwithstanding any other provision of law and regardless of the expiration of such 5-year period, the amount of such excess shall, without the filing of any claim therefor, be credited or refunded as provided in this section: And provided further, That nothing in this section shall be construed to bar from allowance claims for refund filed prior to the passage of the revenue act of 1918 under subdivision (a) of section 14 of the revenue act of 1916, or filed prior to the passage of this act under section 252 of the revenue act of 1918.

"Where a tax has been paid under the provisions of section 221 or 237 in excess of that properly due, any refund or credit made under the provisions of this section or section 3228 of the Revised Statutes shall be made to the withholding agent unless the amount of such tax was actually withheld by the withholding agent."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The last clause of the bill has not been explained. It relates to cases where the tax is paid by a withholding agent, and it appears that the withholding agent has paid the Government too much. There is an ambiguity in the law so that it is very uncertain as to whom this amount erroneously collected should be refunded. The Treasury Department is uncertain what to do with the money in cases of this kind. My own view of the law as it stands now is that it provides that it shall be paid both to the withholding agent and to the man whom we call the taxpayer, although he was not really the taxpayer at all. The bill applies only to cases where the withholding agent under his contract was obliged to pay the taxes, and subsequently it has been found that the tax assessed was not due at all. Consequently the man whom we call the taxpayer is not out of pocket, he has lost nothing, he is charged with nothing, and yet the question arises under the law whether the money does not have to go back to him, and then the withholding agent must try to get the money back from him, if he ever gets the money back at all. This is simply for the purpose of clarifying the law in that respect, and under this paragraph in such cases it would be paid to the withholding agent.

Mr. TILSON. Could this be made to apply to this state of affairs? Certain bonds were issued with tax-free covenant clauses and the gentleman knows—

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. When our income tax was first fixed at 2 per cent of the normal income, it was then provided that where the tax-free covenant was taken care of by the debtor—that is, the person who issued the bonds—he should pay the tax to the Government, and that the bondholder should receive the full amount of his interest.

Now, the normal rate is 4 per cent. If the gentleman has any tax-free Government bonds he will find when he goes to get credit he gets a credit of 2 per cent, but he has to pay to the Government 4 per cent. The one who issued the bonds agreed to pay the tax. As the law stands now he pays only 2 per cent and the gentlemen who were fortunate enough to hold bonds have to pay 4 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TILSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Iowa be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman will remember the law only requires the obligor to hold 2 per cent.

Mr. TILSON. That is correct, but if the one who issued the bonds agreed to pay all the taxes—in other words, if he issued all his bonds with a tax-free covenant clause—the bondholder must pay 4 per cent, and yet he gets only credit of 2 per cent on his income.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is between the party who issued the bonds and the bondholder.

Mr. TILSON. It is between them, but it seems to me that it is an injustice to that extent.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, it is a case as to which I am not prepared to express an opinion, except to say the Government has nothing to do with that, and this bill, of course, does not affect it.

Mr. TILSON. If the debtor promised to pay the entire tax which is now 4 per cent and pays to the Government only 2 per cent, then the debtor has failed to keep his covenant with the bondholder.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. He would be only keeping his agreement.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. Page 2, line 9, strike out the word "immediately."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BURTNESS: Page 2, line 9, strike out the word "immediately."

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment solely for the reason that I believe the word "immediately," included in the present law and also carried in the bill we are now considering, means nothing for the reason that I do not believe that any member of the Internal Revenue Department—at least, if we are to judge of their understanding by their action—knows the meaning of the word "immediately." If that is the case and if they can not be taught the meaning of the word, what is the use of continuing it in the law? I think we are all familiar with the way in which these proceedings are handled now. When an audit is finally made, if they find the taxpayer is entitled to a refund he is advised thereof, and the practice has been that he is invited to file a claim for refund. The taxpayer files that claim and he believes that the money coming to him will be paid him in the course of a few weeks, for the Government has conceded it has been wrongfully withheld from the taxpayer. Well, the claim is filed; the taxpayer waits for several months, but hears nothing. He then writes the bureau, and about two or three months after that time the taxpayer gets a letter advising that investigations are being made as to whether he is owing anything on later returns. After some delay the taxpayer writes another letter, and the reply comes back something like this—that in a subsequent year an additional assessment has been made against him for a certain amount, or some installment is past due. Then the taxpayer looks up his records and finds he has in fact paid the additional assessment or the amount that may have been due, that it was paid by him long before, and so the matter dillydallies along with more correspondence for perhaps two or three or four years, and the money all of that time is being held by the Government. It therefore seems to me that if we eliminate the word "immediately" from the law we can not hurt the law, and the taxpayer will have just as good a chance for getting his money which belongs to him this side of the Styx with this word eliminated as he has now.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. I will.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman should add other letters there that the Treasury Department writes, and one of them is that Congress has not appropriated the money to pay the claim. Then he ought to have cited another letter which he ought to read to his constituents, that this Republican administration and Republican Congress refuses to appropriate money when there is not a word of truth in it.

Mr. BURTNESS. Oh, yes; there are many letters I could have added, but could not for lack of time; but the gentleman from Texas knows most of these letters come after a period of years during which time the Democrats were in control, and that the Democratic administration had three or four years in which to complete—

Mr. GARNER. It is claimed that it is because a Republican Congress declines to make the appropriation—

Mr. BURTNESS. I realize that a letter always comes referring to lack of appropriations, and that is usually the last letter to the taxpayer, but before that letter ever reaches him he is vexed with three or four which I had not time to detail at all.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman might have called attention to other matters of which he is probably unaware. One is that recently the administration has made an important change with reference to the rule of the Democratic administration; and on December 16 the rule was established that where it was claimed that the department found that there was a refund due, it was not necessary to file a claim for refund, but it should be repaid immediately and forthwith.

Mr. BURTNESS. In that respect I thank goodness, the administration, or anybody having to do with the ruling that they are finally able to do away with the foolish and ridiculous rule that where a man has a valid claim conceded and audited to be such by the Government that he must file a claim for refund. It seems to me when he has already—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTNESS. All that should be necessary, it seems to me, is that the refund should be made when ascertainment of overpayment is made, without the necessity of the man filing any claim for refund. The taxpayer should get his money. Another thing that I might supplement to the statement of the gentleman from Iowa is this: That possibly some of the pivotal points in the bureau, held so long by leading members of the Democratic Party, might some day be changed with value to the taxpayers.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I remember a distinguished Senator once offered a facetious bone-dry amendment in the Senate of the United States, and it was adopted. The gentleman's amendment here might for some reason be adopted, and I am afraid he might get into trouble if we took him at his word. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURTNESS. The House will have to take care of that. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] is recognized.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman's amendment is offered more in a facetious sense than seriously.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 13775) to amend the revenue act of 1921 in respect to credits and refunds, had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GREEN of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, House bill 13878, for which this bill was substituted this morning, will be laid on the table.

There was no objection.

EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13774) to amend the revenue act of 1921 in respect to exchanges of property; and, pending that motion, I will ask the gentleman from Texas if we can agree as to time?

Mr. GARNER. Is that the exchange bill?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. How would 20 minutes or 30 minutes on a side do?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think we ought to have 30 minutes, at least, on a side.

Mr. GARNER. Is that the bill to which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] is going to offer an amendment?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; this is the bill to which the gentleman from Michigan is going to offer an amendment.

Mr. GARNER. Let us have 30 minutes to a side; not exceeding 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the general debate shall not exceed one hour, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] and the other half by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13774.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13774) to amend the revenue act of 1921 in respect to exchanges of property, with Mr. HUSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13774, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13774) to amend the revenue act of 1921 in respect to exchanges of property.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, under date of April 10, 1921, the Hon. W. C. Herron, "attorney," "for the Attorney General," wrote the chairman of the House Committee on Revision of the Laws that he had made careful examination of all of the sections of H. R. 12 which relate in any way to criminal law or criminal procedure, and had found "no errors or omissions." February 5, 1921, Attorney General Palmer wrote with regard to that material that "there is no criticism to offer on behalf of this department." You will see that two administrations have given to the criminal code and criminal procedure in H. R. 12 their approval and a clean bill of health. There is no room for criticism of any portion of the law which comes to the attention of the Department of Justice. That feature of the bill is perfect. On March 4, 1921, and in other letters, and to me personally, Judge Jacob Trieber, of the United States District Court of Arkansas, a very distinguished lawyer and law writer, has given similar approval to that part of H. R. 12 which refers to the judiciary. Probably no bill ever presented to the House has received a more thorough indorsement from the highest sources than these parts of H. R. 12.

In the early days of the work on this bill the War Department made a thorough study of it and pointed out two errors, which we corrected, and discovered in their own collection of their laws 27 sections omitted, which they were glad to have. In January, 1921, a young gentleman offered quite a number of criticisms, which were so thoroughly disposed of by the revisers that Secretary of War Baker withdrew them and wrote a full and complete indorsement of the bill and gave it his highest approval.

Here is a letter I received from a judge in Arkansas:

UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE'S CHAMBERS,
EASTERN DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS,
Little Rock, Ark., March 24, 1921.

MY DEAR MR. LITTLE:

I am going over your act as I find time, but confining myself solely to the title of the judiciary. I can not express my admiration for this work. People, especially the bench and bar, owe you a debt of gratitude which can never be repaid. How you found time with your other congressional duties to do this work I am unable to understand. I have read in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD your remarks when you presented your report on the act, and also the remarks made by other Members of the House, which show that your work is being appreciated by the Members who have examined it. You are entirely too modest in claiming credit for your work.

I hope that some day in the near future I may have the pleasure of meeting you in person, that I may express to you my admiration for this work.

With very highest regards, I am,
Yours sincerely,

JACOB TRIEBER,
United States District Judge.

I call attention to letters from Attorney General Palmer and from Mr. W. C. Herron, of the present Attorney General's office, Mr. Taft's brother-in-law. I ask that the Clerk read them.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I am almost as much interested in the bill as my friend is. I will ask him if he has ascertained whether there is any prospect at all of action at the other end of the Capitol?

Mr. LITTLE. I think there is. I will find out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the letters indicated. The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1921.

HON. JOSIAH O. WOLCOTT,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR:

In reply I beg to advise you that the only portions of this bill submitted to this department were section 965 to section 1612 relating to the judiciary, and section 503 to section 551 relating to the Department of Justice.

So far as such portion of the bill is concerned there is no criticism to offer on behalf of this department.

Respectfully,
A. MITCHELL PALMER,
Attorney General.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Clerk also to read the next one.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., August 10, 1921.

HON. E. C. LITTLE,
Chairman, Committee on Revision of Laws, House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of August 1, sending a copy of H. R. 12, to establish a code of laws of the United States, and asking me to look over it and advise you of any views I may have in regard to it.

The sections which seem to relate in any way to the criminal law or criminal procedure have been carefully examined, and, so far as it is possible to discover from such an examination, no errors or omissions have been noted.

Respectfully,

W. C. HERRON, Attorney
(For the Attorney General).

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LITTLE. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BRIGGS. Has not the gentleman also received indorsements from the great publishing houses, like the West Publishing Co. and the Edgar Thompson Publishing Co.?

Mr. LITTLE. Very fine ones. I am going to present to-day a series of department indorsements. I will ask the Clerk to read the letter from Secretary of War Baker.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 21, 1921.

HON. EDWARD C. LITTLE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. LITTLE: I have received your letter of January 19 and am delighted to have the marked copies of committee reports which you inclosed. Senator Carpenter's speech, to which you direct my attention, of course correctly states the answer to the difficulty always raised in the enactment of a great piece of codifying legislation. If we wait until perfection is achieved and the possibility of error removed, we never get the code. In the meantime, practicing lawyers, judges, and district attorneys all over the United States are making vastly many more errors by reason of the fact that they have to rely upon an uncoded mass of legislative enactment, through which it is impossible, even with the greatest industry, to trace out the existing state of law.

Cordially yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER, Secretary of War.

Mr. LITTLE. Herewith I present a letter of April 7, 1922, from Hon. Edwin S. Booth, Solicitor of the Department of the Interior. This letter presents thoroughly and clearly the approval of that department of H. R. 12 and the reasons why every sound lawyer wishes the bill to be passed at the earliest possible moment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SOLICITOR OF INTERIOR SAYS CODE SHOULD PASS WITHOUT AMENDMENT.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR,
Washington, April 7, 1922.

HON. EDWARD C. LITTLE,
Committee on Revision of Laws, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. LITTLE: I am in receipt of your letter of the 5th instant, requesting my views in relation to H. R. 12. This proposed bill has been before the department for some time, and I think with very few exceptions no objection has been made thereto.

As I understand the proposed legislation, it is merely a compilation of the present existing laws and does not purport to contain new legislation. I have not gone over the matter with the idea of suggesting corrections for the reason that in my opinion it is very advisable that the present laws be consolidated and brought into some one volume where they will be easy of access. As it is at the present time, many enactments of Congress are contained in different volumes and, as you appreciate, may sometimes be very easily overlooked. I am of the opinion that if Congress will enact the proposed bill and thus get into a workable condition the present existing laws, that the future Congresses can then make such amendments as may be deemed proper in a much more satisfactory manner.

I trust you will pardon a few personal observations in relation to this character of legislation. It happened to be my privilege to be chairman of the legislative committee of Montana on two different occasions when the question of codification, consolidation, and revision of the then existing laws was before the legislative assembly. I found that it was impractical and almost impossible to undertake to make amendments and to get the legislative assembly to approve them, and in both instances our committee recommended, and the legislative assembly pursued, this course and adopted the report of the committee appointed to compile the existing laws without amendments, leaving to the succeeding legislative assemblies the corrections that might seem best. This method we found so satisfactory that at the last work of the assembly in compiling the laws of Montana we adopted the same course. For these reasons I am strongly of the opinion that H. R. 12 should be passed without any amendment other than those which the committee itself might report, and thus get into some practicable workable shape the present existing laws covering the several matters of public concern. Believing as I do, I am not making any suggestions of proposed amendments and hope and trust that this legislation will pass at an early date, as it will, in my judgment, be of incalculable value to all concerned.

Very truly yours,

EDWIN S. BOOTH, Solicitor.

In the spring of 1922 the Department of Agriculture was asked whether it had any further suggestions, although it had long since carefully canvassed the bill and its suggestions had been accepted wherever they were necessary. They made some further suggestions, which were disposed of, as will be seen by the following letter from the Secretary of Agriculture. As you will see by reading the Secretary's letter, here is another absolute indorsement of the correctness of the bill from another department. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, April 18, 1922.

HON. RICHARD P. ERNST,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR ERNST:

In a conference between Colonel LITTLE and the solicitor of the department yesterday the department's report to you of December 16 last was carefully gone over, resulting in Colonel Little's concurrence in my suggestions with reference to the following sections of the bill: 837, 4866, 5055, 5051, 5061, 5249, 5258, 5282, 5299, 5300, 5320, 6677, 7187, 7323, 7326, 8868, 9489, 9497, 10326, and 3344.

I understand that Colonel LITTLE will take up with you the necessary action to effect the changes in the above-stated sections suggested by the department.

The remaining sections of the bill upon which I reported to you may stand as they appear in the bill.

The department realizes very keenly the enormous task involved in the preparation of this bill, and the only wonder is that it is so generally free from errors and omissions. It is also realized, as Colonel LITTLE suggests, that it is practically impossible to enact a bill of this kind which will be perfect in every respect. That result seems never to have been accomplished in any revision of the laws which has ever yet been undertaken. It seems to me that it is better to have a consolidation of the laws with a few errors which can be corrected by supplemental legislation when discovered than to delay the consolidation indefinitely, striving for perfection which it is more than probable never could be attained.

Very respectfully,

HENRY C. WALLACE, Secretary.

THE CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman give me five minutes more?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Kansas five minutes?

Mr. GARNER. I have 30 minutes, have I not?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas five minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. I thank the gentleman from Texas. In the years of the work on this bill the State Department has made and seen accepted quite a number of its suggestions, and in November, 1922, they were asked by another committee whether they had any objections to make and the recipient got the idea or expressed the opinion that the Secretary had taken exception to the law set out by H. R. 12 with regard to ambassadors. Accordingly, I present herewith a letter of January 27, 1923, from the Secretary of State which clears up that. You will notice that in the letter he says that on December 7, 1922, when he sent to Senator ERNST a memorandum prepared when H. R. 9389 was under discussion in 1920, he said that he had advised the Senator on December 7, 1922, that "the department at that time had no additional suggestions to offer concerning the sections covered by that memorandum." This memorandum is the subject of his letter, and as it was in reference to the bill in the Sixty-sixth Congress, of course it had long since been disposed of, and on December 7, 1922, the department had "no additional suggestions." Here's another clearance paper for H. R. 12 from another department with which I present a brief letter from the chairman of the House committee addressed to the Secretary of State in reply.

I will ask the Clerk to read the letter from Secretary Hughes and my reply.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 27, 1923.

MY DEAR MR. LITTLE: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of January 23, 1923, in which you state that in a communication dated November 22, 1922, to which no written reply has been received, you advised the department of the attitude of the House Committee on Revision of the Laws regarding certain suggestions which the department had made concerning sections 3214, 3221, and 3222 of bill H. R. 12, and that you understood that the department concurred in the view of the committee. You add that Senator ERNST, chairman of the Senate Committee on Revision of the Laws, has informed you of the receipt from the department of a communication criticizing sections 3221 and 3222 of the bill, and inclose a statement of the law as understood by your committee, concerning which you desire the department's comments.

I beg to inform you that in response to a communication dated November 10, 1922, from Senator ERNST, requesting that the department give to the Senate Committee on Revision of the Laws the benefit of any suggestions it might desire to make concerning bill H. R. 12, the department on December 7, 1922, stated that at the time bill H. R. 9389 was receiving the consideration of the House committee a memorandum had been prepared in response to a request from you containing brief comments on certain sections of the bill. A copy of the memorandum was transmitted to Senator ERNST for the information of the Senate committee, and he was advised that the department at that time had no additional suggestions to offer concerning the sections covered by that memorandum.

It is observed that the title of H. R. 12 is "A bill to consolidate, codify, revise, and reenact the general and permanent laws of the United States in force March 4, 1919." At the time the department's memorandum was prepared it was assumed that it was within the scope of the work of your committee in revising the laws of the United States to make all the changes suggested in the memorandum. In any event it was thought desirable to give your committee the benefit of such suggestions as occurred to the department with respect to the sections covered by the memorandum. The question, however, whether the scope of the work of the committee in revising the laws of the United States would permit the adoption of the suggestions which the department made concerning sections 3221 and 3222 of the bill (none was made respecting section 3214) is obviously a matter for determination by the committee, concerning which I would not feel free to express an opinion.

I have noted your statement that after the bill becomes a law you intend to suggest to the department that an amendment be prepared for the purpose of correcting such inaccuracies as may appear.

I am, my dear Mr. LITTLE,
Very sincerely yours,

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

JANUARY 28, 1923.

Hon. CHARLES E. HUGHES,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Replying to your favor of the 27th answering my letter of the 23d, I note that on December 7, 1922, the department, in response to a communication from Senator ERNST dated November 10, 1922, sent him "a copy of a memorandum" and stated that "at the time H. R. 9389 was receiving consideration in the House a memorandum had been prepared in response to a request from the Chairman of the House Committee on Revision containing brief comments on certain sections of that bill" and "that the department had no additional suggestions to offer concerning the sections covered by that memorandum."

I write to inquire whether you will kindly send me a copy of the memorandum that you forwarded him December 7, with the date thereof. H. R. 9389 passed the House December 20, 1920, and the memoranda with regard to that were long since utilized.

I note your remark that you say, "I have noted your statement that after the bill becomes a law you intend to suggest to the department that an amendment be prepared for the purpose of correcting such inaccuracies as may appear." I presume you refer to my letter of April 11, 1922, in which I said, "Our plan is simply to prepare a bill that contains the present law without any change whatever. This bill is now the law, and if it passes the Senate it becomes a law, and we will then have something to begin with, doing away with the past confusion. Our committee will then bring in a bill suggesting some changes correcting what appear to be errors in the present law." I was not referring to inaccuracies in our bill but the errors in the present law, such perhaps as may exist with regard to these ministers and ambassadors, but which are errors by Congress—not in this bill.

Before the old Revised Statutes were fully printed a bill was passed correcting 34 mistakes in it, and two years later a bill was enacted which corrected 242 imperfections in the old Revised Statutes. In my bill to establish a code I have supplied 60 omissions in the Revised Statutes which still remain. If we adhere to the precedent set by the Revised Statutes people, we will, as you suggest, introduce a bill to correct our mistakes if any there be. I suppose we ought to adhere to that precedent, should we not? Our book is three times as large as was theirs, and if we adhered to their percentage of mistakes we would have over a thousand to correct, and with all the nervous assistance of young gentlemen admitted to the bar here and there and people who want us to omit the law to make easy their social duties we have been only able to locate 66 instead of over a thousand. I am glad you feel that what the committee did was just what it should have done.

Very sincerely yours,

E. C. LITTLE.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LITTLE. May I have two minutes more?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. LITTLE. I wish the Clerk to read a letter from John Wigmore. I might say that I have a letter from John Davis, president of the American Bar Association, expressing the earnest hope that this bill will pass.

The Clerk read as follows:

JANUARY 15, 1923.

Hon. RICHARD P. ERNST,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have been very hopeful that the Senate would proceed to the prompt enactment of the new United States Code, passed by the House a year ago last April. During the past year I have used the copy of it in preparing a new edition of my Treatise on Evidence, and have been through every page of the work and find it entirely satisfactory.

For 20 months it has lain in the hands of your committee. Is there any reason that you care to give explaining the delay?

Very truly yours,

(Signed) JOHN H. WIGMORE.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Wigmore is the greatest law writer in the world. I asked the gentleman who received that letter about it, and his reply was that Mr. Wigmore never had read it; that he could not have done it; that he was a damned liar. [Laughter.] I just leave that with you. If I had the time, I would like to express my views on that.

I present here a letter of December 18, 1922, from the Solicitor of the Department of Labor, which makes it clear that the department and the House committee have fully agreed on the bill and the department has no criticisms:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR,
Washington, December 18, 1922.

Hon. EDWARD C. LITTLE, M. C.,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. LITTLE:

In the report of this office of December 12, 1922, to the Secretary of Labor in re H. R. 12, this office has stated to the Secretary that Senator ERNST may be advised that all the changes suggested by the report of this office of April 1, 1921, in re H. R. 9389 have been taken care of in H. R. 12, with the exception of a few, and as to these you have in a conference with a representative of this office recently stated that you would offer an amendment to the present bill to take care of these suggested changes, and that, therefore, there are no suggestions as to changes in H. R. 12 to be made to Senator ERNST.

Very truly yours,

THEODORE G. RISLEY, Solicitor.

The beginning of our suggestions from the Treasury came in the form of insisting that we should reprint the executed law which authorized them to issue something like a billion dollars' worth of Liberty bonds. Their criticism was somewhat severe. As they had issued the bonds and could not issue another billion, the committee decided to avoid complications by not reenacting the law which was executed and done for. The fear of the Secretary that this would injure the legality of a billion dollars of bonds seemed to be without ground, and after explaining it to him the Secretary did not think it was practical to give me the name of his attorney. Subsequent correspondence with that department was very helpful and harmonious, and we know of no suggestions of error from that department since that time, and as far as we have learned they have no criticisms to offer. All suggestions which the revisers and the committee found correct were followed, and with the approval of the department, as far as we can learn.

Under date of April 12, 1922, the committee received a letter from the Hon. D. H. Blair, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which I tender herewith, in which he answers our letter of inquiry as to whether he had any suggestions. He called attention to the fact that there had been much change in the internal revenue law since March 4, 1919, which is the date up to which this bill goes, and gives us to understand he had no suggestions, except that if the committee should decide to endeavor to bring the bill up past March 4, 1919, he would be very glad to assist in that work. The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, April 12, 1922.

Hon. EDWARD C. LITTLE,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of April 5, 1922, addressed to the Solicitor of Internal Revenue, requesting any suggestions which he may have to offer with respect to H. R. 12, which passed the House of Representatives on May 16, 1921.

The solicitor has been requested to review the codification in a detailed manner in order that you may have the benefit of any suggestions or criticisms which may be offered. You will understand that the revenue act of 1921, which was enacted subsequent to the passage by the House of Representatives of the bill to consolidate, codify, revise, and reenact the general and permanent laws of the United States in force March 4, 1919, made some very material changes in the assessment, collection, and refunding of taxes for prior years and the bringing of suits or other proceedings by or against taxpayers. In fact, the changes are so vital and far-reaching that many sections of your proposed code have been practically superseded. In view of the fact that the codification proposed attempts only to cover laws enacted prior to March 4, 1919, you may not be interested in the new and vital changes, but in the event it is your desire to make your codification more comprehensive, I should be pleased to render you any assistance which may be deemed advisable in connection therewith.

Sincerely,

D. H. BLAIR, Commissioner.

In the spring of 1922, prior to the passage of H. R. 12, the committee inquired of the Department of Commerce for suggestions. That department called our attention to one section only to which they suggested some change. As the revisers had given it particular attention, they thought it was right as it was and is. However, the solicitor showed such an earnest and sincere interest in the proposed legislation, and his department was so familiar, of course, with the law under that head, that the committee told him that if the Department of Commerce would prepare that one section just as they felt the law was, and state that that was the law, the committee would accept that amendment and urge the Senate committee to adopt it, providing it was not seriously wide of the mark in our judgment. They did not see fit to accept our suggestion and have offered no further criticism.

In the spring of 1921, in response to our inquiry, Postmaster General Burleson said a few slight errors had been found, and a correction would be tendered. I present herewith his letter and a letter of January 21, 1923. I received from the acting solicitor a dozen or so suggestions made by the Post Office Department November 25, 1922, which for the most part had all been long since presented to the House committee and passed on. The criticisms they suggested with regard to H. R. 9389 were carefully studied and all the proper corrections made in H. R. 12, so that after personal conference with the solicitor's department, many months ago, I was assured that their part of the work was entirely satisfactory, and they had no further criticisms to offer. Evidently some other lawyer remade a few of them in November, and I call your attention to the situation with regard to them, having gone into detail, that you may see just exactly what the criticisms are which confront us in January, 1923, on a bill which passed
